During the debate upon this bill some of the most anomalous things have developed. The Representatives from the industrial sections are telling the Members from the agricultural sections that this bill will not help them; that those who profess to speak for the farmers do not understand the situation, and many Members who are farmers themselves are told by Members from the city that they do not understand the farmers' problems. All are agreed that agriculture is in a precarious condition, but when the remedy is sought the city Member tells the farmer he does not understand the problem. Nearly every Representative who has spoken here has expressed a willingness that farmers should receive a higher price for their products, and then in the next breath he has opposed this measure because it would raise the price of the necessities of life to the consumer. Gentlemen, let us be fair. If you are willing that the farmers should receive a higher price, what difference does it make to you whether he receives it as a result of a decreased production or by reason of withdrawing the exportable surplus and shipping it abroad? In other words, you admit that if there was a decreased production that the consumer would have to pay slightly more, and you urge that. What difference would it make to the consumer if that increase in price were brought about by reason of a small crop or because the larger crop is taken care of under the provisions of this bill? Your position is untenable. Experts agree that the provisions of this bill would increase wheat 20 points and would only increase the cost to the consumer about 1 point. In other words, the all-commodity index would be advanced 1 point where other agricultural commodities would be increased 20 if this bill were in operation. That slight increase would be so little that no one would notice it.

The opponents of this measure have earnestly contended that this was a packers' bill; that it would benefit packers and the milling companies. Here again you have one of those strange anomalies that sometimes develop in public debate. The Representatives on the floor of this House from the packing centers without exception are opposing this bill. That is equally true of the Representatives from milling centers. It therefore follows if we are consistent that these Representatives do not know what their constituents want. Gentlemen, can you imagine anything more paradoxical? Agricultural Representatives do not know what their constituents want. Those representing packing and milling districts are equally mistaken, and the Representatives from city districts must work out this problem. Honestly, is there any consistency in this argument at all? Practically every farm organization in America is asking for the enactment of this law. The only packers' organization in America is opposing it, and practically every organization in the buying and milling of grain is also opposing it. Does that bear out the contention that this is a packers' bill? I submit to you that it does not, and is at least presumptive evidence that it will benefit the farmers. These organizations have given months of the most careful study to this problem and their Representatives are the keenest students of the economic questions as they affect the farmers' interest.

A great deal of opposition to this bill arises from the fact that there would be an overproduction, but experience does not prove the correctness of this contention. Surely no one will argue that the stimulus of this bill would be equal to the stimulus of the late World War. The greatest production of wheat was in 1915, two years before we entered the war. In that year it reached 1,025,801,000 bushels, whereas in 1918 and 1919, after the tremendously effective campaign carried on all over the United States for an increased production, the amount in each of those years was less than 1,000,000,000 bushels. When the further fact is considered that an overproduction will reflect back upon the farmer, because he must bear the burden of taking care of the surplus, surely no one will seriously contend that the farmer is going to make the mistake of greatly increasing his production. Especially is this true in view of his experience during the last two or three years.

Of course, it is impossible to conceive of any law against which possible objection can not be raised, but judging from the experience already had by the farmers, as well as from the results of the campaign for production carried on during the war, it seems clear to me that there will be no great increase in the production of agricultural products during the lifetime of this bill. The great difficulty of the farmer is not altogether the low price of his products, because he is actually getting now a higher price on an average for his crop than he received before the war. The trouble is that the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar is not on a parity with the dollar of other industries. The farmer buys in a successfully protected market and sells in a demoralized world market. America faces, in my judgment, a choice between bringing the price of other industrial commodities down to the world level or lifting the price of the farmers' products up somewhere near other industrial prices. The disparity between them is too great and can not exist much longer. For one I believe the greatest calamity that could come to our country to-day would be the leveling process of bringing everything down to the world market.

We must solve the problem in some other way. Any policy of protection ought to be on the level and treat all industries alike. Agriculture should have the same degree of protection that other industries enjoy.

The McNary-Haugen bill points the way to lift the plane of agricultural products and yet maintain the higher level for other industrial commodities. Had it been in effect in 1923 it would have distributed more than $1,000,000,000 among the farmers and livestock men in the country in addition to what they did receive. It would have greatly increased the property valuation of all farming lands. It would have prevented hundreds of bank failures. Forty per cent of the people of America live outside of incorporated places, the most of them upon the farm. You can not tell me that prosperity in the industrial centers can long continue with the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar curtailed as it is now. The condition in which the farmer now finds himself will be duplicated in every part of our country unless you bring relief to agriculture. The collapse of agriculture in America means the collapse of every other industry in the country. This can not and must not be. We must save America for Americans and maintain the high standard of living in all lines of industry. [Applause.]

It must be borne in mind that this bill is not to cost the Government of the United States one dollar. It is true that a $200,000,000 corporation is provided for, and the Government is required to take stock in the amount that will be needed to carry on the business provided for in this bill, but that will be returned at the expiration of the lifetime of the measure to the Treasury, and some are willing even to pay a small rate of interest for the use of that money. It must further be borne in mind that every dollar of expense connected with the operation of this bill comes directly out of the farmer, and all this he is willing to pay if the price of his product is brought up to a parity with other industrial commodities.

Gentlemen, in conclusion let me say that this is an emergency measure. When our country entered the war we faced many emergencies, but did we hesitate on that account? No. We met and solved every problem and came out of that struggle triumphant. I have absolute faith in my country. It has successfully solved every great problem in the past, and it will solve this problem. It has met every emergency that has ever confronted it. American ingenuity will meet every situation confronting this country in the future. An emergency has been proven. The farmers of this country face a condition and not a theory. There is an emergency here. America will meet it. In my judgment this bill offers the best solution for the meeting of that emergency, and for that reason I shall support it. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD].

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this Congress has been in session something over six months. The eyes of the American farmer have been turned to their National Capital during all this period of time hoping and expecting that some remedial legislation would be enacted in their behalf. So far they have hoped and looked in vain.

As the Congress is nearing its end, with an election fast approaching, with the demands of the agricultural interests becoming so insistent, legislation has finally been reported out of the committee and brought to this floor for our consideration. The farmers of the country are to-day wondering what we have been doing all these months that no remedial legislation has been enacted. We have heard from the White House and leaders of the majority platitudes and high-sounding phrases to catch the ear of the American farmer, but what the farmer is interested in is action, not idle words of praise or sympathy.

With taxes mounting higher year by year, with freight rates advancing, with the purchasing value of his dollar gradually diminishing, with the existing inequality in prices he receives for what he sells and what he is obliged to pay for what he buys, with his obligations soaring skyward and in numerous instances the sound of the auctioneer's hammer ringing in his ears, with conditions which force him to rob the fertility of his soil in order to keep his head above water, it is no wonder he is alarmed and is demanding action by Congress. He knows, and every student of agricultural conditions knows, that if his present predicament continues long his days as a farmer are numbered. His request is not that his Government expend vast sums in his behalf, but that his Government treat him as fairly as it has treated other interests and extend its kindly offices to him as have been extended to others, that he may help himself at his own expense.

It has been well said that agriculture is the basic industry of America. More money is invested in agricultural activities and more people are dependent upon the results of agriculture than the results of any other industry. One-third of our population is directly engaged in this pursuit and every man, woman, and child in America is dependent upon that one-third, directly or indirectly, for food and clothing, the elementary necessities of human life. The farmer pays one-half the gross earnings of the railroads of the country and buys nearly one-half of the manufactured products of the country. His is the key which locks and unlocks the wheels of industry throughout the land. Their continued prosperity depends upon his prosperity. There are practically six and one-half million farms in the country, with a valuation of nearly $80,000,000,000. This is nearly double the amount of money invested in manufacturing industries. Of all the exports of the country, the farmer produces one-half and he contributes more than one-half of the total expense for the maintenance of our public institutions. Upon his products our great network of railroads, our transportation systems by land and by water, are dependent for their continued operation and sustenance. Unhealthy agricultural conditions lead to unhealthy industrial conditions, and unless checked and restored in time disaster marks the end, not only to the farmer but to transportation and industrial activities alike.

We are all interested in the general prosperity of the country. For America's prosperity we must have a well-balanced development between agriculture, industry, and transportation. Neither can long endure successfully without the prosperity of the other. When adversity visits the one, the prosperous days of the other are numbered. Readjustments are necessary when one gains an undue advantage over the other, until a permanent stabilizer is found and applied.

Formerly American life was very simple.

The farmer could live within himself, raise his own foodstuffs, make his own clothing, machinery, and appliances, crude as they were, but he could and did live without the aid or assistance of the outside world. Science, discovery, and invention have brought about an economic development which has changed all that. American standards of life and living have changed. The farmer is now dependent upon the markets for his output and draws on the markets for his continued operation. Modern civilization has wrought great changes and presented new conditions and new problems which must be met and solved in the economic world, and as the march of time goes on, when other business, trade, and callings are bolstered up by special legislation in their interest, it is not strange that things get out of balance and need correction in the interest of the farmer. If we must have special legislation in the interest of other industries and business, then let us have special legislation in the interest of agriculture, the basic industry of America. You must agree with me that it is at least as much entitled to special legislation as any other business.

Unfortunately the scales of equity are far out of balance at the present time. Through the protection afforded by laws enacted by Congress to industry and labor, the price of their products and the scale of their wages have become distinctly an American standard. The protective tariff, the Adamson law, immigration laws, the Esch-Cummins Act have created a distinct standard or scale of prices and wages in practically every line of industrial activity except agriculture. It requires no argument to convince anyone that no set of men in any business, trade, calling, or profession will continue long in that business unless his balance is on the right side of the ledger. If he does not quit voluntarily and go into some other business, he will soon receive an invitation to quit from the bankruptcy court or the sheriff's summons. I am not a calamity howler and do not want to be classed as such.

I want to get as far away from the pessimist as possible. Optimism is the bright light of success in any undertaking. But in dealing with conditions we must deal with them as they are. We must not deceive ourselves. The lure of the high wages of the city is drawing men from the farms to-day as never before in the history of the American Nation. The exodus from the farms to the cities has been gradually becoming more pronounced year by year. It has been estimated that an average of 3,300 persons per day are leaving the farms, seeking other means of livelihood. Our farm population has shrunk nearly 2,000,000, while the industrial centers are becoming larger and larger and more congested. And this condition will continue until the agricultural industry is brought more nearly in balance with other industries, so that the opportunities in agriculture will approximate the opportunities in other industries. Some people complain that so many are leaving the farm and going into the industrial centers. If greater opportunities are awaiting them elsewhere, they are not doing themselves justice if they do not go. Human nature is so constituted that men and women will go where the opportunities are best; this is but natural; it is the law of the universe; in other words, self-preservation is the first law of nature. If it continues at the present rate, this migration from the farm to the industrial centers, industrial America will soon reach the stage of overcongestion. The wheels of industry will cease to turn. The smokestack of the factory will no longer belch forth clouds of smoke, and our great transportation system will cease to function in its accustomed channels through business stagnation and depression.

Factories can not long operate without an outlet for their products. The transportation systems of the country must have commerce to transport for their continued activity, and without the commodities of the farmer to be transported back and forth from the farms to the cities and the industrial centers, the steel bands of our great railway system, a veritable network spreading to the remotest corners, polished by the continuous use of locomotives and freight cars pulling the commerce of the Nation to-and-fro, would soon be transformed into streaks of rust and decay.

The failure of the farmer means the accumulation of goods upon the merchant's shelves, in factory, and warehouse. It means curtailment of operations in the factory and a resulting unemployment. Something should and must be done to equalize conditions and avoid the wreck and ruin which is sure to follow in the wake of these abnormal conditions. Something should and must be done to restore the equilibrium between agriculture and other industries in order to avoid the wreck as far as possible. The equilibrium should be hastened and not retarded. The greatest question which now confronts the American people is how best to restore this equilibrium. The high protection afforded industry under the Fordney-McCumber tariff law has placed the farmer at a decided disadvantage. It has given the manufacturing interests of the country an undue advantage. It enables the manufacturers to operate at a much greater margin of profit. It returns into the Treasury but $500,000,000 annually, while it costs the people of the country, by way of increased cost of the things they must buy, $3,500,000,000 annually, much of which falls directly on the farmer. A protective-tariff policy never did and never will help an industry which must depend upon the world markets to regulate and fix its prices.

The agricultural industry of this country must sell and compete in world markets by reason of the fact that America produces a surplus of farm commodities and that surplus must be sold in competition with world production. The price of the exportable surplus determines the price of commodities sold for domestic consumption. He can not pay American standard of wages or enjoy American standards of living when he is forced to sell in markets fixed by open world competition and purchase the things required by him in a local, protected market. Financial prosperity can not be his under such conditions.

What, then, is the remedy? Credit facilities have been extended to him, but it is not credit he needs. He is already too heavily involved. He needs relief that will enable him to discharge his indebtedness before he is consumed by the debts he has already contracted. Organization and cooperation is to him a shield of protection only to a limited extent. The organization of labor has placed the laboring man on a higher plane than ever before. It has brought about better wages and better working conditions. Labor never could have attained the standard it now enjoys but for organization and cooperation.

The manufacturing industries of the country have profited by organization and cooperation, but special legislation enacted at their behest for many years past has so contributed to their welfare until there has grown up in this country a standard of prices and wages known as the American standard, with which agriculture can not compete without corresponding legislation in its behalf. By organization and cooperation other industries can figure the demand and can create the supply accordingly. Not so with the farmer. He might figure the demand, but the supply is difficult. Many uncontrollable circumstances overnight may transform his whole calculations. The early frost, the drought, wet weather, blight, insects, destructive pests, devastating storms, and any number of other exigencies lay waste his crops, which, can not be foreseen. Epidemics and disease among his livestock are beyond his vision, consequently he is handicapped in equalizing supply and demand and can not reach an estimated basis with anything like the degree of accuracy of other business. No man or set of men has ever yet been able and never will be able to control the elements. Farming interests are so scattered and diversified, and so fraught with uncertainties, that successful and effective organization is economically impracticable.

The farmer, who has not been one favored by legislation as other industries, compelled to labor under such disadvantage, can not compete with the industrial centers, and we find the man power of the farm gradually diminishing, with no prospects of a change until farm prices are restored and stabilized. The result of this is broad acres lying idle, impoverished and depleted soil fertility, old homesteads going into decay, homesteads which once flourished and gave forth abundant fruits and bountiful harvests now growing up with straggly oaks and pines. The migration from rural to urban centers threatens the stability of our whole economic system and menaces the future welfare of the American Republic. The United States must adopt a definite policy as to agriculture and industry. We have reached the period when we must determine whether we will strive for a permanent, well-rounded, self-sustained national life, in which there will be a fair balance between agriculture and other industries, or whether we will sacrifice agriculture for the building of cities and an industrial nation, which must be more or less dependent on outside support.

We have the facilities, we have the equipment, we have the natural resources, we have everything within our domain for a well-rounded national life. Shall we develop it symmetrically or shall we continue in the future as in the past to develop certain industries at the expense of others? All I ask for agriculture and all agriculture asks for itself is an equal opportunity. This it is entitled to and must have if our boasted prowess of America is to continue undiminished. A well-developed national life calls for the development of all our great resources, not at the expense of any one but for the common good of all.

Ordinarily I am opposed to legislation for any special interest, and would oppose legislation of this character in the interest of the farming class alone, which is to some extent paternalistic, but when I consider the fact that other industries are profiting at the expense of the great agricultural masses of the country through special legislation in their behalf, and when I further consider the fact that to have national prosperity we must have a well-balanced prosperity between other industries and agriculture and transportation, and when I consider the unfortunate dilemma in which agriculture is now placed by special legislation accorded other industries, for the preservation and protection of the American farmer, as a matter of self-defense for this industry, so essential to our national welfare, to establish the equilibrium between agriculture and industry, I am willing to waive my natural antipathy against special privilege and vote a little special privilege to the farming interests of this country to place this industry on a parity with other industries.

There has been presented to us for our consideration this bill, known as the McNary-Haugen bill. There were many objectionable features in this bill as originally presented. The Committee on Agriculture, after extensive hearings and due consideration, have revamped the bill, retaining the essential principles of the original bill but eliminating many of the objectionable features. The bill now, to my mind, presents a fairly workable plan. It is, as has been said, a new departure in farm legislation. Some may say it is too paternalistic, but it is not more paternalistic than a protective tariff for the protection of the manufacturing interests of the country; it is not more paternalistic than the law authorizing a commission to adjust freight rates for the transportation interests of the country, whereby they are permitted a margin of profit over and above operating expenses and maintenance and upkeep. It is not more paternalistic than other measures that have been placed upon the statute books under which other interests are made to thrive. It lays claim to being no more than an emergency measure. The emergency now exists. It costs the Government nothing. All expenses of its creation and operation are borne by the agricultural interests themselves. It is true credit is extended to the extent of $200,000,000, but it is only credit extended, not a gift, and every dollar will find its way back into the Treasury. There may be some defects in its workings. If so, time will disclose these defects and future Congresses can correct them if it be deemed advisable. I believe it is a start in the right direction. That something is necessary for the relief of the farmer is conceded by practically everyone. This seems to be the only plan so far presented for relief in this present emergency.

Its basic feature is to release that portion of the farmers' commodities consumed at home from the prices fixed through competition in the markets of the world and put him on an equal footing with other business which has been the recipient of special legislation, that he may enjoy the American standard of wages and prices enjoyed by them. It subjects the exportable surplus only to open competition in the world markets and spreads the difference between prices received for the exported surplus and the prices received for domestic consumption proportionately over the entire product marketed. That will tend to restore the equilibrium between agriculture, transportation, and other industries. It will enable the farmer to work out his own salvation at his own expense; and, with a cooperative marketing system so worked out as to take up the slack between producers and consumer, I believe agriculture will thereby be enabled to hold its own, and with well-rounded development between agriculture, transportation, and industry, with the equilibrium established and maintained, the general welfare of the people of America will be promoted.

Gentlemen, I have been listening to the general debate on this bill for something like 14 hours. I have been giving due consideration to the words of wisdom uttered in the debate on this bill, both pro and con. It is indeed interesting to me to see in this great body of Representatives from the great Northwest, the great outdoors of America, God's own country, Members of this House affiliated with the party now in power, after standing here for years past voting and working in the interest of the great New England States as that section sought and received special legislation through a high protective tariff, now coming to this Congress for some relief for their section. When they ask for bread, you gentlemen from that great section offer them a stone. [Applause.] It has been well said here, gentlemen, that this country is nonsectional, and with that I agree. It should be; but I observe also on this side of the aisle some of my friends and colleagues from the great Southland lining up against this bill, and I wonder why.

I do not like to say that personal interests control men in their actions or deliberations, but, gentlemen, I venture the assertion that were the price of cotton down to 5 cents, as it was a few years ago, and relief were available to the cotton grower by this bill you would see many of these gentlemen scrambling over themselves to have cotton written into the bill.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARNOLD. I will.

Mr. ASWELL. If cotton was 5 cents and the ratio price 19, and 65 per cent of the cotton was exported, it would bring down the price of cotton in this country 2 cents for the producer.

Mr. ARNOLD. I thank the gentleman for his contribution, and I presume that is his version of the matter. Gentlemen, objections have been made to this bill for the reason that it is a price-fixing measure. It is not a price-fixing measure but a price-adjustment measure. I ask you gentlemen in all fairness and in all candor, is not the agricultural interests in this country entitled to a relative price with other commodities for their commodities? I ask you gentlemen in all fairness and candor, is it anything unreasonable for the agricultural interests of this country to come to this Congress and ask this Congress to enact some legislation that will enable the American farmer to help himself at his own expense?

This, as you have been told, will not cost the American Government one dollar. It has been said here by the opponents of the bill that it will increase production, and increased production will drive prices down. I grant you that it will have that tendency, but at the same time the men who have been opposing the bill on the ground that it would increase production are supporters of cooperative-marketing bills designed to increase the revenues of the American farmer on his commodities; and if you increase the revenue of the American farmer on his commodities, by whatever system proposed, you thereby increase production just the same.

This bill will dovetail in nicely with a broad cooperative-marketing plan, which will assist the farmer materially as a measure for permanent relief by taking up the spread in prices between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays. Let us write this upon the statute books and give it a trial. If we do that, I believe the pendulum will swing back before adversity strikes the hour which spells the demoralization of what has heretofore been the greatest industry of the country and the institution upon which all our flaunted prosperity must rest. We owe a duty to industry, to ourselves, and to our country to cooperate and work together to bring into our American life that harmony of a well-balanced prosperity that our people may enjoy that happiness and contentment so necessary to the welfare of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, it is necessary that the products of labor be in proper form to facilitate transportation and exchange. This is necessary to give the product exchangeable value. Supply and demand regulate values when artificial regulations do not interfere with this natural law. This natural law is as immutable as the tides and as resistless as the sun. No one can say exactly the point where demand begins or ends or where supply ends or begins in relation to the creation of value. But supply can be adapted to demand and the gulf between the producer and the consumer is not so fixed that it can not be bridged. It can not ever, in my opinion, be filled.

Organized effort in production, transportation, and distribution will help promote more harmonious operations of the natural law controlling supply and demand.

The man-made conditions in the world markets as well as the domestic trade are out of gear with nature and as a result the unfortunate farmers are being ground between the upper stone of high prices for his necessities and the lower stone of low prices for his products.

Many uneconomic laws and regulations have contributed to this condition—the high protective tariff, high freight rates, and increased wages. The greatest factor however, in my judgment, which has contributed to the economical seesaw is the fact that for more than a century we have devoted every energy to building and encouraging manufacturing enterprises. Not only have the great cities, but every village and hamlet, through commercial clubs and chambers of commerce, been dinning our ears with the cry for more industries and more dinner-pail brigades.

Members cry "Keep the Government out of business," but this comes rather tardily at this time, when for more than 50 years the Government has been in the money business and has turned this popular product over to private persons to profit on and take toll of the American people.

The Government has put the farm-loan business in the hands of private persons by providing that the stock subscribed by the Government should be returned. When the money is returned to the Government these farm-loan banks then assume an independence of action which works to the detriment of the farmers. Instead of making liberal loans so the farmer can take up their present mortgages, they restrict loans, and the farms go to the block.

In 1890 there were no farm mortgages in Oklahoma.
In 1900, 9.8 per cent of the farms were mortgaged.
In 1910, 39.2 per cent of the farms were mortgaged.
In 1920, 61 per cent of the farms were mortgaged.

The Government set the banks up out of money a part of which was paid in taxes by the farmers and for the purpose of relieving the home-owning farmers, but the banks have gotten into the hands of some who are not interested so much in how the farmers come out but how well the banks will fare.

We protect the manufacturing industries and have done so for nearly a century, yet we hear nothing from the opponents to this bill about socialism in these matters.

You talk about raising the cost of living, but you do not discuss the failure of any living on the farm.

Some of you want wages reduced, and thus return to normalcy, but the reduction of wages will not appeal to the farmers, as it is in the good wages of labor where lies the hope of markets for his food products. It is not high wages that is hurting; it is low prices.

The prices of the things which the farmer must purchase whenever perchance he can buy a few necessities are several times higher than the prices of his products. The products of the farmers will hardly buy one-half the amount of necessities that they would buy in 1919. Clothing has risen in 10 years 101 per cent; building material has risen 81 per cent; while farm products rose 17 per cent.

Maybe this bill will not do all the things its proponents hope, but one thing is sure, you can not hurt conditions.

The farmers of Oklahoma are not struggling for comforts but for their very existence, for food and clothing, and for a roof over the head of himself and family.

Give him a little lift so that he can regain his foothold. There are no more optimistic people on the earth than the farmers of Oklahoma. The floods descend and the droughts come and the boll weevil thrives, yet he goes on from year to year with grit in his craw and hope in his heart.

I am hoping the day will come when the farmer will have the benefit of his toil and some reasonable compensation for the labor of himself and family.

Congress has been increasing the tariff for the protection of infant industries until, like old-age pensions, the amount of protection increases with the age of the industry.

Let the country pause a moment and realize that the basic industry of America, namely, agriculture, has been neglected and forced to struggle for nearly a hundred years against the greatest odds.

Let cities, towns, and villages give some time to the encouragement of this great industry and relieve in part the tremendous burden resting upon the Government of the United States.

Now to the bill before us for consideration. Shall it pass? And will it have my vote and approval? It will have my vote but not my full approval. It is counter to all my ideas of economics. It sells products at home for more than abroad. I could never vote for the bill but for the fact that the manufacturers have been and are now doing that very thing under the protection of the tariff laws and there is no chance to repeal the tariff laws in time to do the farmers any good.

I like provisions in the Norris-Sinclair measure and believe that the Curtis-Aswell bill would give a permanent basis for agriculture. But, gentlemen, we do not face theories; we face real conditions. There is no time for long arguments or delaying diagnosis. We must pull the farmer out of the meshes of disaster or he will perish. There will be plenty of time to diagnose and patch him up, because he is already injured enough, until you will have an opportunity to try all your remedies. So I am supporting this measure not because I think it is the best, not because I favor the theory or principle upon which it is grounded, but because I am convinced that unless some positive steps are taken to meet the present emergency in agriculture, that hunger and unemployment will stalk the streets of our manufacturing cities, and that political revolution will run riot from coast to coast.

Representatives of a hundred and ten million people, ponder well your vote.

The bill has many valid objections, but you must remember that no measure can meet the full approval of a majority of the Members.

The committee considered it for over four months. Some call the bill as reported a monstrosity. If it took the committee four months to bring this out, what could you expect to vote for if they are given four more months of time?

I can not set my judgment against the committee to the extent that I am willing to vote against the only measure offered and then go back to the farmers of Oklahoma, who have lived in dugouts and starved to build a civilization in a coming Commonwealth, and say that I bid my opportunity to vote for some relief under a plea that the measure is uneconomic, and confess my inability to meet the emergency thrown upon me as one of their Representatives. If I err, let me err on the side of him who feeds the world and toils uncomplainingly in the face of tremendous odds. [Applause.]

I am unwilling to confess that the House of Representatives of the United States is impotent in this emergency.

We met the transportation emergency to the tune of over a billion dollars. We met the shipping emergency to the tune of $3,000,000,000. We met the emergency of the high cost of living to our employees to the tune of several million. Are you going to fail the farmer? [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, it has been alleged time and time again that this measure would bankrupt the farmer. I have here petitions signed by 4,150 farmers, 847 bankers, 5,843 business men, 7,497 others—all told, 58,383 signers. They are all for the passage of this bill. I ask the Clerk to read the letter transmitting the petition.

The Clerk read as follows:

ILLINOIS AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, May 19, 1924.

Hon. GILBERT N. HAUGEN,
House of Representatives.

Greeting:

Our down-State farmers, bankers, business men, and others of the great State of Illinois in large numbers have expressed through petition, which I have the honor to bear with me, commissioned to deliver to Congress, their interest in the early passage and enactment into law of a measure pending in Congress and known as the McNary-Haugen bill.

There is attached herewith for reference a summary of the several petitions.

ILLINOIS AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have here a list of 300 associations indorsing the bill, an addition of 10,000 individuals. We have armfuls of indorsements from various sections of the State. Do you want to take their word for it or take the politician's word for it?

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I have an acquaintance in Washington who claims to represent the farmers. I do not know how many. His name is Benjamin Marsh.

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, I will turn him over to you, or I will refer him to the gentleman from Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FUNK].

Mr. FUNK. Mr. Chairman, the opponents of this bill seem to think that the only people who are supporting it are farmers, and that the workingmen throughout the country are not supporting the bill. I do not know how it is in any other State than Illinois, but I do know that in Illinois the Illinois Federation of Labor and its affiliated associations are supporting this bill. I have received a letter from that organization which I send to the desk and ask to have read, in my time, which will indicate the support of the Illinois Federation of Labor for this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

[John H. Walker, president Illinois State Federation of Labor, chairman; Dennis McCarthy, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, secretary treasurer, legislative representatives of Illinois State Federation of Labor; United Mine Workers of America, District 12; Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen; Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen; Order of Railway Conductors; Women's Trade Union League; Illinois Journeymen Barbers' Association. JOINT LABOR LEGISLATIVE BOARD OF ILLINOIS,
May 15, 1924.

Hon. FRANK H. FUNK.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: At a recent meeting of the Joint Labor Legislative Board of Illinois consideration was given to the deplorable condition in which the farmers find themselves as a result of the ruinous deflation policy instituted some three years ago and the need of Federal legislation to assist them in recovering from their bankrupt condition, which Government reports show a great majority of them to be in.

Inasmuch as the Government has seen fit in the past to assist and protect various business and financial institutions, it appears only fair that Congress would heed the plea of the farmers in giving to them some measure of relief at this time.

By unanimous action of the members of the board we were instructed to advise you that after careful consideration of the legislation now pending in Congress that the Joint Labor Legislative Board of Illinois joins with the Illinois Agricultural Association in requesting you to give your support and vote for H. R. 5563, known as the McNary-Haugen bill, which provides some measure of relief and assistance to the farmers, which they are in need of so much at this time.

Trusting that you will give this measure your favorable consideration, we remain, Respectfully yours, DENNIS MCCARTHY, Secretary.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, a good deal has been said recently as to the location of the opposition to this bill. The gentleman from the State of Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] yesterday made a strong effort to make it appear that the opposition is purely sectional. That charge 30 years ago would have had perhaps some influence, but such a suggestion now on a question of this character of national importance is pure bunk. I have had hundreds of letters from all parts of the United States in opposition to the bill, but I have not burdened the RECORD with them. Let us look hurriedly at a few examples.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman has heard my question in regard to the cattle situation.

Mr. ASWELL. I did not know that the gentleman had asked it.

Mr. RAKER. Cattle have been selling for 4½ to 5 cents a pound for cows and 5 to 6½ cents per pound for steers. That has been going on for several years. The people are paying from 25 to 65 cents a pound for meat. How is this bill going to aid the man who raises the cattle?

Mr. ASWELL. The bill is impossible and unworkable with reference to cattle, if you mean to reduce the spread between the producer and the consumer.

Mr. RAKER. We have to concede that the price of meat to the consumer now is too high.

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. And the producer is not getting enough.

Mr. ASWELL. That is correct.

Mr. RAKER. How is this bill going to protect these cattle people in the West?

Mr. ASWELL. My candid judgment is, after four months of study, that it is entirely hopeless and helpless in that respect.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me so that I may answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. ASWELL. I have not the time. I wish now to call attention to a few letters which indorse the opposition to this bill. Here is a letter from Mr. H. L. Wray:

PARK RAPIDS, MINN., May 17, 1924.

Representative J. B. ASWELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have just noticed by the papers that you were opposing the McNary-Haugen bill and wish to commend the stand you are taking.

This bill, if it becomes a law, could only aggravate an unfortunate situation, and I do not see how anyone who has given the matter any thought could approve it. Trusting that this bill may meet the defeat it deserves, I am,

Respectfully yours, H. L. WRAY.

The Nebraska Farmer and the Nebraska Union Farmer are opposed to this bill.

The following opinions were expressed by ex-Governor McKelvie, L. S. Herron, and C. Vincent, of Omaha, Nebr.:

The editor of the "Nebraska Farmer," former Governor S. R. McKelvie, and L. S. Herron, editor of "The Nebraska Union Farmer," official paper of the Nebraska Farmers' Educational and Industrial Union, the largest farmers' organization in the State, have both been following the course of incubating legislation and have both arrived at the same conclusion regarding the McNary-Haugen bill now before Congress.

The Omaha grain exchange takes pleasure in cooperating with them to the extent of reprinting and mailing these editorials to Members of Congress.

To establish a basis of equal exchange between certain agricultural products and the general level of commodity prices would mean that ultimately all agricultural products would have to be included. When this had been done, the next step would be to reverse the procedure and raise certain commodities to an equal basis with agricultural products. The general level of wages is abnormally high now, but this will not continue always and should the cost of living advance so that the laborer's dollar would have a purchasing power below the general commodity level, it would follow that the Government, if it is to be unprejudiced and fair, would have to adjust wages. It would be like a dog chasing his tail.

The argument is made, and it is tenable, that industry and labor are now subsidized or protected by certain laws which give them a distinct advantage over agriculture. It is held that the tariff enables industry to keep prices of commodities up, and immigration restrictions enable labor to control wages arbitrarily. Admitting that this condition obtains, at least in a measure, it is doubtful that it can be continued indefinitely. Meanwhile, one may not be sure that these benefits are not reflected to agriculture, for industrial activity and good wages undoubtedly help the domestic market for agricultural products and are an aid to prosperity on the farm.

On the other hand, the Wallace plan to attempt to maintain domestic prices of farm products by dumping the surplus abroad and assessing the losses back to farmers, while having the merit of being self-supporting, might easily result in assessing back losses as great as the gains. Consumers would certainly cut down their consumption of the products to which the plan was applied and leave a greater and greater surplus to dump abroad.

The Wallace plan offers nothing to improve either the domestic or foreign demand for farm products. Instead, it would simply force, or attempt to force, domestic consumers to pay higher prices for their food, regardless of their ability. Although it would not put the Government so directly into the marketing business as would the Norris-Sinclair bill, it would set up a lot of Government red tape that would frustrate and hamper real cooperative marketing.

LETTER FROM C. VINCENT

A Member of the present Congress mailed a copy of the McNary-Haugen bill to Mr. C. Vincent, secretary and former general manager of The Farmers' Grain Co., operating several farmers' elevators, asking his views concerning this measure. Below is a copy of his reply. (Mr. Vincent has been actively engaged in cooperative efforts for 20 years.)

"Since wheat is a world-wide product and the demand for it universal, the market can not become normal so long as Europe is in a state of economic turmoil. When the United States exerts its acknowledged influence on the side of world peace and world financial stability there will be hope for a remunerative wheat market, and not until then."

Doctor Jardine, who is the president of the agricultural college of the State of Kansas and who is reputed to be the best-informed and most popular citizen in the State of Kansas among the farmers, expressed the following opinion:

If I lured them into following any such fantasy as the McNary-Haugen scheme, when the inevitable reaction came my usefulness would be destroyed and I would be ruined utterly. Were this measure to be enacted into law, its practical working out would leave the men who fathered it without a shred of reputation.

The following statement comes from Mr. S. G. Rubinow, who is the general manager of the Minnesota Potato Growers' Association:

ST. PAUL, MINN., May 15, 1924.

Press reports indicate your bill has opportunity for passage. Congratulations and best hopes. Is there anything I can do to assist? Sincerely and earnestly feel, based on long and practical experience with entire problem of distribution costs and marketing, that your bill offers only sound and permanent solution. Given financial association and control their own selling, which is part of economics of production, thereby changing permanently their present unsatisfactory economic status. If present administration will not intelligently take up and solve this problem, conditions will get worse and farmers everywhere turn to radical and demagogical measures.

S. G. RUBINOW,
General Manager Minnesota Potato Growers' Association.

The following is a statement taken from the Iowa Homestead, which I understand has the largest circulation of any journal of the kind in Iowa:

The idea that the price of a farm product or group of farm products can by a miracle of government action be made to bear a continually definite relationship to the ever-changing and uncontrolled prices of other groups of commodities is a fallacy.

An analysis of the figures submitted by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture shows that this ratio price will fluctuate from month to month, and inasmuch as the bill removes all possibility of hedging these fluctuations will tend to destroy all stability in the grain business. Indeed, the bill makes it absolutely impossible for one who buys wheat on a ratio price one month not to lose money or make money if he sells it on the ratio price of the next or some other month.

Notwithstanding the expressed opinion of these leaders and many others the McNary-Haugen bill was thrust down the throats of the uninformed delegates to the recent Iowa and Minnesota Republican State conventions. I do not recall when a pending measure, pretending to be of economic value only, was thus made a political football. Its very use in this manner justifies suspicion as to authorship, good intention, and ultimate value to the general body of stockmen and farmers.

After a long, careful study of the situation I am convinced that the McNary-Haugen bill will not do the farmer any good, but will harm him; it will not lower freight rates; it will not eliminate 1 penny of the duplication of waste between the producer and the consumer; it will not stop speculation in grain and pork; it will not bring the wheat acreage down to what it should be; it will not do anything except to add another commission to those which perform nothing worth while.

I am bringing these to the attention of the committee, because it has been asserted here that only in the East and South is there opposition to this bill. The opposition is widespread in all sections of the country. Here is a letter which I did not intend to use until a moment ago, signed by A. F. Shotts, which I ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

MASON CITY, IOWA, May 16, 1924.

Hon. J. B. ASWELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Fight the McNary-Haugen bill to the last ditch. It is wrong in principle and will prove worthless, and is Bolshevistic and un-American. It is bad and should be rejected. Go after it hard.

The country does not want it—only those who are playing for votes from the farmer are for it.

Yours truly,

A. F. SHOTTS.

Twenty-five miles from HAUGEN'S home town.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I now call attention to another letter. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] yesterday made an effort to have it appear that opposition to the bill is sectional. Here is a letter from the secretary of the State Farmers' Union of the State of Washington, which I shall ask the Clerk to read in my time for the information of the gentleman from Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Spokane, Wash., May 17, 1924.

Hon. J. B. ASWELL, M. C.
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your activities in forwarding the interest of the Curtis-Aswell bill is greatly appreciated by our farmers in the Northwest, and on their behalf I desire to extend to you our thanks and appreciation for your splendid work.

We believe this bill as it is drawn, placing the machinery for its operation and all responsibility upon the farmers themselves, is the best and most constructive bill that has been offered in behalf of agriculture for a generation. Whenever the farmers are allowed to assume the responsibility of looking after their own business they will become self-reliant, self-resourceful, broadened in vision, and will develop a better understanding of all business problems, and therefore will become better citizens and better equipped to take a leading part in the affairs of this Nation. I do not believe any bill will prove successful in placing agriculture on its feet again and pave the way for a permanent prosperity for the farmer that is not worked, planned, manned, and controlled by the farmer himself. He will strenuously object to any plan that will single him out and place his business under any politically controlled department, bureau, or appointee.

Agriculture is in a deplorable condition, and something must be done by this Congress or millions more of the farmers will be forced from their homes. It would be difficult indeed to exaggerate the deplorable condition of the farmer at this time. He is not in a condition, either mentally or financially, to be experimented with. He has ever been true and loyal to his Government and always in the hour of his country's need he has rallied nobly to her defense, but how long can he be expected to keep up this true loyal spirit under the treatment he has received for the past few years? There is now a dangerous unrest springing up among the farmers everywhere that would require very little to direct him into the camp of the extreme radical if something is not done at once to change the trend of affairs as they affect the farmer. This is not an opinion manufactured for the occasion, but an opinion formed after spending more than a half century among the farmers, and the last 17 years actively at work among them in farm organization work, gathered from conversation from farmers of all political faiths and creeds, many of them a few years ago considered ultraconservative.

There is a strong feeling that the Government is more or less responsible for their present condition. The administration of the United States Grain Corporation, under which the Government guaranteed the price of wheat, was arbitrarily held down and the minimum price made the maximum price, while the sky was the limit for everything the farmer had to buy, was considered a great injustice. At the same time the Government used every resource possible to spread propaganda to urge the farmer on to greater production. Slogans such as "Food will win the war," "Grow more wheat and win the war," and many others were sent out all over the Nation, with the result that the farmer bent every effort to grow more food. Every available acre was put under cultivation; old retired farmers that were thought too old to do active work on the farm were again requisitioned into service. The result of the increased production was flooded markets, poor prices, and less than cost of production, to be followed up another year, and another, and so on, hoping that conditions would change and that he could recoup some of his losses by this continued increased production, only to find that the more he produced the worse off he found himself to be. This was followed by the deflation program, ordained and carried out by the powers that be, that drove a million farmers from the soil into the already overcrowded cities, to be followed by other millions in the near future if relief is not imminent. These other millions are now permitted to stay on their farms only because their land would not sell for enough to pay the mortgagee, who does not want the land. Could you wonder at the farmer being in a rather bad frame of mind? Could you wonder at his insistence for a plan that will place his business in his own hands and remove him from the control of any political control, either elective or appointive? Is he not entitled to this much from this Congress?

Would it not be an insult to any other class of our citizens to be singled out as incompetent and placed under the paternalistic care of the Government? If so, would it not be equally as great an insult to the farmer? Is this Congress ready to place this discount on his intelligence? If our Nation is to attempt a paternalistic form of government, the farmer will demand that it be applied to all kinds and all classes of citizens, and that they be not singled out and branded as a class of incompetents, incapable of handling their own business.

The Curtis-Aswell bill represents his idea of what he wants and what the Congress should do for him. Rather than pass any compromise legislation that will deprive him of his self-control we sincerely hope that this Congress will send him empty handed away and not attempt to arouse any false hopes through any plans of Government control that will but mean failure, rendering him more helpless in the end. Upon this idea of self-help we are ready to stand; we believe the farmer is entitled to it. We know he is entitled to it.

If you could send me several hundred copies of the hearing on the Curtis-Aswell bill, I will be pleased to mail them out to our farmers. Let me again express my high appreciation for the splendid work you are doing on behalf of the farmer.

Very truly yours,

A. O. CROSS,
Secretary of the Farmers' Union.

Mr. ASWELL. Then there is the following from the New Orleans Times-Picayune:

SOMEBODY IS MISTAKEN

Sundry Republican Senators, in caucus the other day, expressed grave fears that the Republican Party will lose the farmer vote next November unless the McNary-Haugen bill is passed. So it was decided in caucus to press for action upon this and other farm-relief measures.

The McNary-Haugen bill is so weird and wonderful a confection that it has been discussed at length in the national press. Its avowed primary object is to bolster the price of wheat by Government aid extended via extremely complicated—and costly—price-fixing process. Its complexities bewilder laymen and stamp it as the product of theorists. Distressed wheat farmers in certain districts of the Northwest apparently have swallowed it whole, accepting at face the assurance that it will cure what ails them. So their Representatives in Congress are pushing it. But, apart from this distressed minority group, American farmers display no eagerness for its enactment.

Governor Davis of Kansas—himself a "dirt farmer" in a wheat-growing State—declares that measures like this McNary-Haugen bill "are brought forward by politicians who believe that the farmers are easily fooled. The farmer," he adds, "does not want special privileges," but needs instead "fewer expensive stimulants of government and more common horse sense in the administration of government." Doctor Jardine, president of the Kansas State Agricultural College, asserts that, "were this measure to be enacted into law, its practical working out would leave the men who fathered it without a shred of reputation. If I lured the farmers into following any such fantasy as the McNary-Haugen scheme, when the inevitable reaction came my usefulness would be destroyed and I would be ruined utterly. * * * If there is any demand among Kansas farmers for the McNary-Haugen bill I have yet to run across it."

The Nebraska Union Farmer expresses the belief that the McNary-Haugen plan "would break down of its own weight in a very short time. The whole scheme is on the boot-strap lifting order, artificial, cumbersome, expensive, and bureaucratic, and offers no assurance that it would accomplish the purpose for which it is proposed."

"Enthusiasm" for this measure seems confined largely to Washington. The Senate's Republican caucus evidently mistakes the clamor of the legislative group which has fathered the "boot-strap lifting fantasy" for the voice of the farm people. The President's range of vision and of hearing is not so narrowly confined. It may be hoped with some confidence, therefore, that he will give the McNary-Haugen "fantasy" its quietus by veto if Congress is stampeded to its passage.

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that this bill proposes not a private corporation but governmental control strictly, nothing more. The corporation is to be created by the Congress. The President of the United States is to appoint the members of the corporation and they are to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States. The corporation is to be presided over by a member of the Cabinet. The certificates are to be printed at the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and by a Government bureau, the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. It is from top to bottom governmental and the Government would be morally bound. Two hundred million dollars is to be appropriated from the Federal Treasury, from the taxpayers, and $1,000,000,000 is to be borrowed. There is not a gentleman in this Congress to-day, having voted for this bill, who would not later cast his vote in an emergency to appropriate another billion dollars to pay the losses of this corporation. The Government would be morally bound because it is a Government corporation. So it is—the Government involved from start to finish. A good deal has been said and some excitement created because some said I called this measure some names.

I want to show by high authority that I am correct in my description of this bill.

I said that the McNary-Haugen bill is unconstitutional. In the majority report on page 79 it is admitted that in certain transactions the bill is probably unconstitutional. Any good lawyer knows that its proposed interference with the right of private contracts makes it so.

I said that the bill is not only unsound in principle and unworkable in practice but it is paternalistic. Webster says that paternalism means a principle or practice of control of the governed by the government. That is the primary principle of this bill.

I said it is socialistic. Socialism, according to Webster, is a political and economic theory, the essential feature of which is government control of economic activities. It means that the Government takes control of production and distribution of the necessities of life. It is obvious that this bill proposes exactly that procedure.

I said it is communistic. Webster says that communism advocates a powerful central government, a system of social organization in which goods are held in common; the opposite of the system of private property. It means a system which gives large powers of government to small political units involving common ownership, common responsibility. This bill represents exactly that idea. The Government would declare the farmer incompetent and control his business, while each farmer would be responsible for the payment of the equalization fee, to share in common with other farmers in the total cost of operation and of losses by the corporation. He would bear the cost whether he exported his products or sold in the domestic markets.

Socialism originated in Germany, but it required generations for it to take hold of the German people. Communism originated in France, and it has not yet taken large hold upon the people of France. These theories find their fullest expression in the Soviet Government, where Bolshevism is in control, making Russia to-day the tragedy of the world. This bill leaps to Bolshevism at a single bound and could properly be presented to the Soviet Government except that it would make a Russian Bolshevik seem to be a stand-pat reactionary. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I say, as I said in the beginning, that it would enslave the farmer, be a calamity to the people and to the Nation, should we embark upon this program of paternalism and take even a single step in the direction of the socialistic conditions in Europe. I say, as I began, that I do not fear that this bill will pass. I would like to see it overwhelmingly defeated. And why? Because I am a friend personally of every Member of this House, and the men who vote for this bill may find their only salvation in the hope that it will never become operative, because if it should become operative every man who voted for it would be in danger. When the equalization fee is demanded and farmers are threatened with fine and prison, and when the hordes of Federal agents swoop down upon his constitutents going into their homes to watch their business, it would so irritate and enrage the farmers that they would annihilate the man who voted for it. My idea is that your chance lies in the prospect that it will never become operative, or you who vote for it will not escape the wrath of your constituents. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, just think of the ultraconservative Republican from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] supporting and voting for this bill after listening to the gentleman preceding me [Mr. ASWELL] calling it radical, communistic, Bolshevistic, and almost every other name in the dictionary. Wonder how a little of his own medicine tastes to him.

But I imagine the gentleman from Kansas is in very much the same position in which I find myself. His constituents are flat on their backs. They need and demand relief; and unless it is granted it will react unfavorably on the whole country. And I want to say in that connection that no man has the right to make the statements made yesterday by the gentleman from the eighth district of Minnesota [Mr. LARSON] to the effect that the failures and bankruptcies in Minnesota are largely of the shoestring variety. Any man who can make such a statement has either been enveloped in a Rip Van Winkle sleep for three years, or he is blessed with a shoestring intellect. [Laughter and applause.]

The objection is made to this bill by conservative Republicans from the East that it will increase the cost of living to the American people one billion dollars, or perhaps two. Undoubtedly it will increase the cost of living. Just how much no one can say. That is one feature of the bill I do not like; and there are others, even in its present amended form. For that reason I would greatly have preferred the Norris-Sinclair bill, amended, or similar measure that would lessen the enormous spread between producer and consumer and eliminate the profiteer, the grain gambler, and food speculator. That is the fellow we need to get after. But I am not given a chance to vote for any such bill, so I am going to do the next best and vote for this one, in the hope that it will accomplish even more than is claimed for it. Even if it does increase the cost of living to our people because of increased prices to the farmers, I claim the farmers of the Nation, especially the farmers in my section of the country, have it coming to them because of all that has been taken out of their pockets the last few years. It is merely a readjustment. In that respect this bill is a farmers' adjusted-compensation bill—not a bonus.

As for the objection that it is a price-fixing measure, I ask, why object to it on that score? That is nothing new. A new term, perhaps, but the principle is old enough for every Republican to be familiar with it. Just call it a tariff and it will sound much better to you. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet." You of the manufacturing East have lived and prospered on the price-fixing tariff these many years. And for the same number of years the farmer has been the loser by it. Now we ask for him just a little of this protection that has been given the manufacturing East. I can understand how Democrats who do not believe in a high tariff can vote against this bill. But I certainly can not understand how eastern Republicans who have grown fat on a high tariff could justify a vote against this bill on that score.

There is also the price fixing of the transportation act. But I have no time to discuss that now. Let me say this in closing: If this measure is not passed by the Congress, or if it is passed and vetoed by the President, then will come the acid test for you people who have talked about being friends of the farmer. I challenge you to join with us from the West and stay here all summer, if necessary, in order to enact some legislation that will really benefit the farmer. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD]. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there has been a theory in this country almost continuously since the Civil War that all that was necessary to have general prosperity for all of the people was to lay a high protective tariff and that thereby, by taxing the consumers of our country, prosperity would prevail. But we have arrived at a time when we see the fallacy of that theory of government. You can not tax the consuming public of America with higher tariff taxes and expect prosperity to prevail. If you could break down all of the economic laws and allow the law of supply and demand to prevail in all industries, agriculture would take care of itself, but for 50 years agriculture has been robbed of the purchasing power of the products of the farm in favor of the protected industries of this country, and the hour has come when this issue must be settled; the hour has come even in the party of the administration, when the Republicans of the West no longer agree with the Republicans of the East on this question of protection, because they realize that their constituency has been paying tribute to New England throughout all these years.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] yesterday made one of the most selfish arguments I have ever heard in favor of manufacturing as against the balance of the country. So while this bill does not conform to my ideas or theory of government, yet I believe that as a matter of self-defense on the part of agriculture against the manufacturing industries of this country it is justified, and I am going to swallow my academic theories on the question of the tariff, on the question of gratuities, and on the question of governmental privilege and vote for this bill, because I believe it will give the agricultural interests of this country a chance to get upon an equality with manufacturing, which has been enjoying these special privileges for years.

If I had my way, gentlemen of the committee, I would first reduce the tariff duties on all the articles that the farmer has to buy, as well as the balance of the consuming public of the country, and place them on an equality by an adjustment of tariff duties. Next I would formulate a foreign policy—something we have not had for four years—which would develop some markets abroad for the surplus of the farmers of this country. Then I would increase the powers of the Federal Trade Commission so that it could investigate the profits of middlemen and regulate, if you please, the profiteering in foodstuffs, and give the producer a little more of the money which the consumer has to pay for these products. Then I would reduce the freight rates on agricultural products and give them a preferential rate. Those four things I would prefer to do, but since my party is not in power and can not do those things, and there is no relief with regard to those policies, I consider it my duty to my farmer constituency in Indiana to vote for this bill. Although its underlying theory may not be correct, I believe it is my duty to vote for this bill in order to put the farmers back on an equality with the other industries of this country, and that is what I am going to do. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I have given careful consideration to all of the agricultural relief measures introduced during the present session of Congress. Each is designed to afford some form of relief. The passage of one of these measures does not automatically preclude the passage of some of the other bills, because they are not necessarily antagonistic or inconsistent. Some of these measures are intended to afford quick temporary relief, while under others the relief would be delayed but may be of a more permanent character. But so far only one of these bills has been reported favorably by the Committee on Agriculture, and that is the bill we are now considering, generally designated as the McNary-Haugen bill.

I am actively and aggressively supporting this measure. In so doing may I say that I do not consider it a panacea for all the agricultural ills which now afflict this Nation. I do not consider it a perfect measure in every respect, and I concede that in several features the bill is not entirely satisfactory to me. But the purpose of the bill is wholesome, and I am convinced that the plan presented is workable and will afford the agricultural classes substantial temporary relief and in a measure relieve them of the unjust burden under which they now labor.

I regard this as an emergency measure, and I believe that its enactment will do much to restore agriculture to the class or group of profitable occupations. I believe the exigencies of American agriculture are such that the Members of this Congress, both Democrats and Republicans, can well afford to resolve every doubt and every question in favor of this bill.

I have heretofore on several occasions on the floor of the House called attention to the nation-wide agricultural distress. I have, I believe, shown that some of the suggested remedies will not afford the farmer adequate relief from the present unbearable conditions. I have heretofore demonstrated, I believe, that relief can not come by a nation-wide limitation of production, nor by an increase of tariff duty, nor by diversification of crops. I will not here repeat the arguments made by me in former addresses on these propositions.

Every Member who has spoken on the agricultural situation during this session of Congress has frankly admitted that conditions are deplorable. Members who are opposing this bill are profuse in their expressions of sympathy for the farmer and profess a willingness to help the farmer, but they have offered no substitute for this measure, and they have not presented and are not advocating any comprehensive plan to relieve the farmer of his burdensome handicap.

These professed friends of the farmer remind me of the ancient fable of the crocodile that weeps in sympathy as it eats its victim. In the Arabian Nights we are told of a prince of the illustrious family by the name of Barmecide, who flourished in Bagdad contemporaneously with the Caliph Harun-al-Rashid. Barmecide in his great sympathy for the famishing beggar Shacabac, invited him to his home and promised him a feast on rich viands, but set before him only empty dishes. The special privileged classes for more than a generation have been promising the American farmer a feast of prosperity, but the dishes set before the farmer year in and year out have been empty.

What relief do the opponents of this bill offer to our agricultural classes? This bill is being viciously opposed by the Representatives from the New England and Middle Atlantic States, where the industrial lords of the Nation revel in wealth and prosperity, which came to them by tariff laws so exceedingly high as to shock the conscience of the Nation. The manufacturers of the United States have been the beneficiaries of a price-fixing policy. The purpose of the so-called protective-tariff system is to create artificial conditions and reduce competition, thereby enabling the manufacturers to fix prices, so as to insure greater profits than would accrue to them in the absence of these high tariff laws.

The gentleman from Massachusetts who so vigorously denounced the pending bill yesterday on the floor of this House represents a section of our country that for 75 years has levied tribute on the farmers of the Nation. His constituents have grown rich beyond the dreams of avarice, as a result of class legislation; and he and the people he represents would never oppose class legislation for the benefit of others if they had any sense of appreciation for the favors they have received in the form of high tariff schedules.

I understand that many Representatives from the great centers of wealth and population will vote against this measure. Can it be possible that the financial, commercial, and industrial interests of this Nation will deny to the American farmer a chance to save himself? Are these interests determined to destroy agriculture, drive the American farmers into bankruptcy, and reduce them to a condition of servility?

Are we to have the opposition of the sugar growers of Louisiana? Must we fight the lumber interests of the Nation? The sugar and lumbering interests are enjoying the benefits of a high protective tariff. They are never satisfied and always asking for an increase. No doubt before the Sixty-eighth Congress adjourns the sugar growers and lumber lords will crawl on their bellies into the lobbies of the House and beg that the tariff on sugar and lumber be increased. [Applause.]

The citrus growers of the South have succeeded in getting their products on the high-tariff list, and in due time they will probably besiege Congress for an increase of the duties on oranges, lemons, grapefruit, and other products of the South.

I am sorely disappointed and grieved that many Representatives from the cotton-growing States are opposing this measure. The cotton growers of the South enjoyed tremendous prosperity during the World War. A minimum price was fixed on the farmer's wheat, but the cotton growers of the South prevented the Government from regulating the price on cotton. I assert that this action was indefensible. The western farmer has not forgotten and will not forget the economic injustice to which he was subjected during the war, when the minimum price of wheat was fixed, and, contrary to all expectations, the minimum price made the maximum price, while the sky was the only limit in the price of cotton. And now many Representatives from the cotton-growing States are vigorously assailing this measure which is designed to afford some little relief to the western farmer.

Let me say now that the present high price of cotton will not always prevail.

The cotton grower is now living in a fool's paradise. It is inevitable that there must be sooner or later a material reduction in the price of cotton, and I believe the time will come and it is not far distant when the cotton grower of the South will be in as serious financial and economic plight as that of the western farmers at the present time. Why not prepare for that evil day by helping the grain and livestock farmer now, so you can ask and expect this aid if adversity comes to your own household?

I appeal to the Representatives of the great cotton-growing States, of the States that produce sugar, lumber, and citrus fruits in large quantities, not to block the road, not to defeat this measure, not to be a party to the economic destruction of the western farmer. The cotton producer is vitally interested in the prosperity of the great West, because anything which impairs the buying power of the western people must necessarily reduce the demand for your cotton products, and our financial distress will soon be reflected in lower prices for your staple commodities.

A few weeks ago the Members of this House from the Southern States urged that the Representatives of the great agricultural West support the Muscle Shoals project. They told us that the prosperity of the South was at a low ebb, and that the consummation of the Muscle Shoals project was necessary to revivify and rehabilitate the entire South. We heeded your prayers and vigorously supported and voted for the Muscle Shoals lease, although some features of the bill were of questionable propriety and wisdom. Now, did you appreciate the votes of the Representatives from the great agricultural States, without which your Muscle Shoals fight would have been lost? We came to your rescue. Will you not come to our rescue? Will you now deny our constituents the relief the pending bill offers? I am putting this question squarely up to you. What are you going to do about it? In all probability the Muscle Shoals measure will have to be considered again in this House. Our future action toward that project will depend very largely on your vote on the McNary-Haugen bill and other farm-relief measures.

Do you imagine that we will tamely continue to vote with you on matters of vital importance to the South when you, by your votes, slap us in the face and deny us the poor privilege of trying out this experiment, which will not injuriously affect you?

But you say that the McNary-Haugen plan is not workable and is not a good thing for the farmer. Who says it is not a good thing for the farmer? Certainly the western farmer, in his bitter experience, ought to be a better judge than the Wall Street banker, the protected manufacturer, the protected lumber dealer, the protected sugar interests, and other representatives of class legislation and special privilege. You say it will hurt the farmer. The corn grower, the wheat grower, the grower of livestock—the farmers who are affected by this bill—they say they believe it will help them, and they know what will best promote their interests. The farmers who will be affected by this bill have studied its provisions, and they are satisfied with it. If it should not be workable they will suffer and not the cotton planter, the manufacturer, the lumber kings, or the Wall Street magnates.

And let me say to the Representatives of the protected manufacturing interests that you, too, are living in a fool's paradise if you think for one moment that you can promote the interests of your constituents by defeating this bill. I warn you that you are playing with fire, because you are defying the agricultural classes of America. You are refusing their fair and reasonable demands. You are contemptuously ignoring their requests. Without the farmer vote the high protected tariff system would have been destroyed many years ago. You have slobbered over, cajoled, and deceived the agricultural classes for years. You have held out to them false promises and hopes that you knew could never be realized. You have bled the American farmer systematically and unconscionably for a generation. The excessive high protective tariff system has enabled you to extort from the farmers of this Nation annually hundreds of millions of dollars in the increased cost of their supplies. You have exacted and collected tribute to the uttermost farthing. You are the beneficiaries of high tariff laws which compel the American farmer to buy his supplies in a protected market at artificially stimulated prices, while compelling him to sell his commodities in the open markets of the world. This has been openly and publicly admitted by numerous Republicans during this debate, and is not denied. The banquet served to the farmers by the protected manufacturing interests of the Nation is a modern Barmecide feast, at which the farmer gets nothing to sustain his economic life but can only lick the empty dishes of the special-privileged classes. Certainly you do not expect the farmers to get fat upon such a diet.

In opposing farm-relief legislation the manufacturers are inviting disaster and creating a resentment on the part of the agricultural classes which will inevitably be reflected in a radical reduction of tariff schedules. The manufacturing interests of this Nation should realize that the buying power of the agricultural classes has been paralyzed, and this deplorable situation will be reflected and is now being reflected in reduced demands for the products of mills and factories. The manufacturer is vitally interested in a prosperity that is nation-wide and not localized in one particular portion of our country.

During this debate able Republican Members of this House who have loyally supported their party all their lives have openly and publicly denounced the selfish manufacturing and capitalistic interests that are viciously fighting this bill while enjoying the benefit of high tariff laws and special-privilege legislation. This is not a political question. Democratic farmers and Republican farmers are alike demanding this legislation. What will benefit the Democratic farmers will to an equal extent help the Republican farmers. Their interests are identical. They must sink or swim together.

But it is charged that this is a "price-fixing" measure. I say it is a "price-adjusting" measure. It does not definitely "fix" the price at any given point, but is intended to "adjust" the prices of these certain commodities so they may bear an equitable relationship to the price of approximately 400 other commodities in general use. This law seeks to give the farmer's dollar the same comparative or relative purchasing power it had in the period of 1905 to 1914.

But suppose we concede that this is a "price-fixing" law. What of it? Shall we condemn it because, forsooth, it seeks to fix the price of agricultural commodities on a basis that will return to the farmer the cost of production together with a fair profit? Shall all price-fixing measures be anathematized? If so, you must repeal the tariff laws, for it is admitted that they create artificial conditions and enable the manufacturer to fix higher prices on his products than could be secured without the tariff.

The Federal reserve system, as to interest and credits, is a "price-fixing" law. It creates an organization by which the price of one of the most important commodities—that is, interest—is regulated or fixed. The transportation act is a price-fixing law as to passenger and freight rates and also as to the net earnings that carriers may retain. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the governmental agency by which the price of passenger and freight service is fixed. Telephone and telegraph tolls are regulated by a price-fixing law. The Adamson Act was a price-fixing law as to labor. The services performed by one-half million Federal employees are regulated by price-fixing laws, because the service and labor performed by Government officials and clerks is as much a commodity as corn, pork, cotton, or transportation services.

The farmer's plight is largely the result of the Government having systematically for a half century or more indulged in an extensive "price-fixing" legislative program. The manufacturers, the carriers, the great financial institutions, and labor have all been the beneficiaries of "price-fixing" laws, and it does not lie in the mouths of the representatives of any of these interests that have profited by price-fixing laws to condemn this measure on the ground that it is a "price-fixing" law. The great labor organizations have patriotically given their approval to a program having for its object the rehabilitation of American agriculture. The laboring men and practically all other occupations recognize that the farmer must be prosperous, or labor, commerce, transportation, and industry of every kind will suffer. Why do not the manufacturers, the capitalists, and other special privileged classes show the same public spirit and interest in the welfare of the American farmer that labor has shown?

The opponents of this bill, while professing great friendship for the farmer, have offered no definite plan to meet the present distressing emergency. Judging from their attitude toward all worth-while farm-relief legislation, methinks their professions of friendship are dentilingual—that is, formed between the teeth and the tongue—or perhaps dentilabial, or articulated between the teeth and the lips.

Many of the opponents of this measure frankly state that they are opposed to all pending farm-relief measures. They say that nothing can be done by Congress for the farmer; that he is the victim of economic conditions for which there is no remedy; that he must work out his own salvation with fear and trembling, and that this Government is impotent to afford any relief. In reply may I say that it is one of the functions of government to prevent one class of citizens from preying on other classes. Shall this Congress confess its inability to devise any plan for the rehabilitation of American agriculture? Shall we proclaim to the world that under our form of government legislative and economic handicaps may be placed on the farming classes, and which burdens this Government has no power to remove? Shall we by word and vote sanction the claim that our Government can perpetrate an economic wrong on one-third of its citizens and then be powerless to remedy the social injustice it has created? If so, then our Government has failed in its most essential and vital purpose. I believe Congress has the power to remove every economic handicap to the creation of which it has been a party. I believe that Congress can correct every social injustice that flows from an abuse of its legislative powers. I sincerely trust that this measure may have your support. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FULBRIGHT] such time as he may desire.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks a letter from one of my constituents dealing with the bill under consideration. It is from a man of much learning and wide experience, and, although a manufacturer, he is interested in farming and has given much thought and study to the agricultural situation. He gives some timely advice to the business interests opposing farm legislation, and coming from a high-tariff Republican of the Middle West his suggestions might well be considered by the high-tariff Republicans of New England. This letter in full is as follows:

HEADLIGHT FARM,
Canalou, Mo., May 5, 1924.

Mr. J. F. FULBRIGHT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FULBRIGHT: Replying to your letter of March 12 in regard to the McNary bill, I have delayed my answer because I found it difficult to make up my own mind. On the whole, I am inclined to advise you to vote for the bill. In my comments please keep in mind that I have been a high-tariff Republican practically all of my life and that at present my main interest is as a manufacturer rather than as a farmer, as far as income goes.

My chief objection to the bill is that it assumes that the period just preceding the war was a normal one for American agriculture and that it tends to reduce the farmer's level of possibility to the results obtained in this period. As a matter of fact, most farmers were standing privations which were tolerable only because of advancing land values and of the hope which this seeming prosperity brought about. There was a certain amount of real prosperity in the heart of the Corn Belt, and it is with this part of agriculture that Mr. Wallace is familiar. In effect, though not in words, this bill would establish a maximum price above which the farmer could never hope to get. The minimum price on wheat established during the war proved to be a maximum, and it will be so in this case. The vital factor in the present agricultural situation is that the banking and business interests before the war found an outlet for our surplus agricultural products because they were compelled to use them to pay our annual interest bill due to Europe. This disposed of the troublesome surplus and left the home market protected by the tariff with a large purchasing power from the high wages which labor was receiving. I always advocated the protective tariff of almost any height on this ground and believe that the policy was justified by conditions and events. The conditions are different now. We can not dispose of a surplus abroad in payment of our debts, and the farmer gets no benefit from the tariff, in fact it prevents him from selling his surplus abroad and taking pay in the products of European labor, which is all Europe has to pay with. It should not be overlooked, however, that if the importation of manufactured goods closed American factories it would reduce the home market for farm products to a certain extent, but to a limited extent only, because people do not increase their purchase of food in proportion to increase of income. They eat a little more and buy a lot more luxuries. It seems to me that the protected industries ought to jump in and support this bill with a whole heart to keep the farmers from becoming desperate and smashing the whole tariff system. The protective system has existed through the sufferance of the farmers of the Middle West. The argument of the protected interests, including railroads and banks, that the McNary bill is paternalistic is worthy of the joke column. As an advocate of a protective tariff I have never claimed that it was not paternalistic. I do not consider it as much so, however, as the Federal reserve law or the Cummins-Esch law.

I do not take any stock either in the argument that there will be too much red tape and bureaucracy required to operate this law. A detailed examination of the red tape and bureaucracy required by the tariff system would make any possible machinery for the administration of this law look very small. There is no valid distinction either between collecting money and paying it out for public purposes and leaving it in people's hands without collection for the public benefit as we do in the case of railroads, banks, and industry. Stripped to its basic elements our whole economic system is supported by an income tax on the farmer which leaves him at best a poor living and in most cases drives him into bankruptcy and despair.

The argument that an increase in farm prices would be at the expense of general prosperity is disproved by the recent history of high wages in industry. We have been absolutely assured that conditions such as have actually existed in industry could not possibly exist under the wage scale which we have actually been paying, and everyone admits that the country has been prosperous except in the case of agriculture, although manufacturing capacity now represents the enormous increase due to the war, not the so-called normal before the war.

Money as a circulating medium in the body of the Nation is not a mere rhetorical simile, as compared with the circulation of blood in the human body. Labor and farming are the two legs on which the Nation stands. If we were positively assured that a man could not afford to spare blood to circulate through his legs because it would rob his vital organs, we should know the argument was ridiculous, especially if we tried it on one leg and found out that all the members prospered except the other leg. Labor got its own pump and pumped its share of the blood. I doubt the possibility of the farmers being able to do the same thing, and I do not believe that the condition of gangrene which we now have in the agricultural leg can be allowed to continue without infecting the other organs. The supply of blood is not decreased by making it circulate in every part.

I am not at all convinced that the McNary-Haugen bill will put enough circulation through farming to keep it healthy; at least it will not reach below the knee. Mr. James, of the Federal Reserve Board, says that cotton is still raised "under practically slave conditions" in spite of the present relatively high cotton prices. All that the cotton farmer would get out of this bill is that he might not be allowed to fall lower than the bottomless pit in which he lived before the World War.

In my opinion there is no program now proposed for the American farmer which will give him the relief he requires. Normalcy does not lie in putting him where he was before the World War, either actually or relatively, because conditions are different. Human forces are like mechanical forces. Motion is always in the direction of the stronger force, and to-day all the other forces in our economic and political structure are greater and more concentrated than they ever were before and the farmer is left relatively weaker. Every buyer is a bear in spirit and the farmer has no practical means of resisting this downward pressure. The so-called law of supply and demand presupposes the ability of both parties to bargain on equal terms. In every crop there are enough growers compelled to market at once through financial necessity to put them out of the bargaining class and enough products are marketed in this way to dominate the market and repeal the law of supply and demand for the balance of the growers even though they might be in position to hold.

The Chicago Tribune sagely advised the farmers of the Northwest that their plight was due to the radical Representatives which they have been sending to Congress. In an editorial headed "Back to grass" it advised its readers that the solution of the agricultural problem lay in letting the farms go back to grass. It was callousness of this kind on the part of the powerful which caused and justified the French Revolution. To one who knows the mental and physical suffering through which farm families have been going, the cruelty of that editorial and the attitude of mind which lies behind it justify radicalism, communism, Bolshevism, or any other desperate attempt at a remedy. I am beginning to believe that there is no help for the farmer until he becomes desperate enough to shake the foundations of capitalism. This might carry him down in the common ruin, but it might force the balance of the Nation to solve the agricultural problem as part of their own problem and abandon the fiction that we are still a Nation of individualistic coon hunters, spreading out over a land of natural opportunity.

Under the laws of the physical universe, finely divided matter is pushed into the vacant spaces of the heavens by the repulsive force of light, in violation of our old ideas of the law of gravitation; but when this matter gets into close enough contact the law of gravitation resumes sway and overcomes the force which pushed the matter together. In other words, the laws which regulate the behavior of dispersing matter are not those which regulate the behavior of condensing matter, and I suspect that this applies to human society also. God appears to have uniformity in his methods.

Very truly yours,

XENOPHON CAVERNO.

This letter is but a reflection of the general feeling and sentiment of the farmers throughout the Nation. The Congress and the President may well heed the warning. The farmer will no longer be "soft-soaped" by fine phrases of the politician. He is facing bankruptcy and despair. What he wants and what he must have is action and not promises, and for my part, I shall resolve every doubt in favor of the farmer when considering legislation which seeks to grant him relief. Many bills have been introduced having in view relief for the farmer, most of which have been pigeonholed in committee and will never reach the floor of the House. I introduced H. R. 6069, the object of which was to lower the prices of farm implements and fertilizers, but it has met the common fate of farm legislation. Apparently the pending bill is the only farm relief measure that we will have the opportunity to pass upon, and I shall give it my support.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, reference has been made here to a college president from the State of Kansas who, I understand, has visited Washington. Up to date I have not been able to find a single solitary Congressman from Kansas who was interviewed by this president while he was in the city of Washington, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL] whether he considers this man's reputation ruined now so far as Kansas is concerned.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I certainly do; and that is the estimation of the farmers of the State as indicated by the letters I have been receiving from them concerning his attitude.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. You understand he is already ruined?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. A letter was read here from Mason City, Iowa, written by a man by the name of Shotts. I live 50 miles west of Mason City, and I never heard of this gentleman in agriculture or in anything else, and I want to suggest to him that if he has any doubt about the standing of GILBERT HAUGEN in the fourth congressional district of Iowa I advise him to run for Congress against him. They have been trying it out there for 30 years, and they have never succeeded yet. [Applause.]

This is the only opportunity this Congress is going to have to present agricultural relief. If you vote to strike out the enacting clause of this bill you will vote to deny agriculture a fair hearing on this floor. If you vote to strike out the enacting clause of this bill, there will be nothing more said in this Congress concerning agriculture, and that applies to both sides of the House. The roll will be called, and we will see who the friends of the farmer are and who it is that wants to say in this Congress, "We will not give any relief to agriculture under existing conditions."

I think this is the most far-reaching bill that is going to be presented to this Congress or the next Congress, and I want to say to every gentleman here on either side of the House that this bill and the principle involved in this bill is going to be knocking at the door of this Congress or at the door of the next Congress unless you adopt it now.

The bill has to do, if you please, with the adjustment of industry and labor and agriculture, and that is what every good citizen of the United States ought to be in favor of; and in case it is not adopted by this Congress I want to say that the trials and tribulations of agriculture are not going to stay out west of the Mississippi River. They are going to come knocking at the door a little farther east all the time. The interest that is due out there on mortgages in this western section of our country is going to be defaulted. You may say that our people are wealthy. They showed an advertisement here where Iowa was rated as the richest State. We are wealthy, but we are not making any money.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. No; I can not yield. I only have a few minutes.

Our industries are slumping. We are not able to make a profit on what we are doing, and how long can a factory maintain smoke in its chimneys if they are eating into their capital stock every day?

The principle involved here is not only economical but political, for it has to do with fixing policies that are going to be far-reaching in the future, and they are going to be fought out in both parties on both sides of the aisle, and no man is going to be able to escape his responsibility. It is admitted here by the worst enemy of this bill that it will work on wheat. If it will work on wheat, the wheat farmers are entitled to relief, because democracy is organized for the benefit of the people, and if it does not render the relief when it has the opportunity it is not performing its full function to the governed. If it will work on wheat, why not on hogs? If it will work on hogs, why not on corn? The processing of hogs is no more intricate than that of wheat. The processing in one thing is no more intricate than the processing of another. It is amusing to me when they say it will not work on corn, and then we find Doctor Corn ASWELL in Louisiana, where they produce 29,000,000 bushels of corn out of the 3,000,000,000 bushels, come up here as a corn doctor and tell us what we need to fix it up so as to take care of the corn situation.

Who raises the corn and hogs in this country? Who raises the pork chops that you eat down here nearly every day on the table? Of corn and hogs of this country 42 per cent of the hogs are raised in Iowa, Illinois, Missouri, Nebraska, and Indiana. Forty-five per cent of the corn is raised in these same States. And who is there here from those States asking that this law be enacted into legislation? With reference to corn, are you willing to take the opinion of Doctor Corn ASWELL whether this law will help the farmer, or will you go out and take the word of the farmer who produces the corn and is interested in the financial end of it? Will you take the statement of a farm bureau and a farmers' union of these locations that produce the corn? Who produces the hogs? The same localities that produce the corn, because one is coexistent with the other. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that this will not work as to hogs. On the other hand, John Brown, president of the National Livestock Association, says it will work with reference to hogs, and he is in the market game every day. He knows the marketing process on hogs. He knows what is to be done in order to make a successful delivery of hogs to the market, and he knows what it will take to manufacture them. He knows how farm products are exported, and he says that this bill will work.

Whose opinion does this Congress want to take, the man in the business or the man that has made a theoretical study of this bill and who lives in a district that produces no pork?

We are told that the spindles of Massachusetts are becoming idle, and when you look over sales of their products not the slightest deduction is there made in the price of an article. Why? Because they are so organized that they can take care of their output at the price that pays them a profit.

Now, that is all that the farmers ask you to do here. This bill is not going to be put into operation to take care of all the hogs in this country. It is only to be put into operation when there is an exportable surplus and you have to sell your pork at less than the ratio price. [Applause.]

THE M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL AND ITS RELATION TO PRIVATE AGENCIES

Much is made by the opponents of the McNary-Haugen bill of the claim that it will destroy existing private business now performing useful functions in handling farm commodities. Just how much displacement of this character there will be is impossible to estimate, but certainly no important agency that is efficiently and economically engaged in performing a useful service would find its duties changed or its field limited under the plan set forth in this bill.

In going upon the market to buy the surplus of any commodity, in contracting for processing this commodity if necessary for foreign sale, and in perfecting the actual sale in export it is certain that the corporations will have the good business judgment to secure these services in the least costly and most efficient way possible. It is with that thought in mind that the authors of the McNary-Haugen bill inserted the following section in the proposed law:

> The corporation shall utilize, so far as practicable, existing facilities and agencies, including the associations of producers, in the exercises of its powers and shall exercise the power granted it in Paragraphs I and III of subdivision A only if the existing agencies or facilities can not be used or obtained on reasonable terms.

Loudest of all in their opposition to the McNary-Haugen bill have been a coterie of grain exporters headed by Julius Barnes, who has employed his position as president of the United States Chamber of Commerce in every conceivable way to fight this bill. It is plain to any student of grain marketing that ample opportunity is provided by the McNary-Haugen bill for the millers and grain elevators to employ their facilities in grain handling under conditions exactly as favorable as at present. Even with the grain exporters there is no reason why the corporations should not utilize them in foreign sales, provided they will render the service at as low a cost as the corporation could perform it. It is true that the corporation will probably encourage a policy of handling as much of our grain exports in the form of flour as possible, which might not be wholly to the liking of the grain exporters.

But, at any rate, since Mr. Barnes is taking such a prominent part in opposing the McNary-Haugen bill, it is proper to inquire just who are these grain exporters and how important are they that they should be weighed against the interests of the six or seven million farmers whose welfare and in many cases whose very existence on the farms are closely tied up with the McNary-Haugen bill.

Fortunately, the information needed to answer this inquiry is at hand. The Federal Trade Commission on May 16, 1922, published Volume I of its study of grain exporting, dealing particularly with "Interrelations and profits of grain exporters." From this study we learn that there were only 90 companies which in 1921 exported any wheat whatsoever, and only 36 companies that handled as much as a million bushels of wheat each. Of these 36 companies, only 18 are American, while 18 were wholly foreign or were largely controlled by foreign stockholders. Forty-six per cent of the total wheat exported in that year was exported by foreign companies. Of the first three companies in volume of wheat exports for 1921, an English company stood at the head, a French company came second, and in third place stood a concern largely dominated by Belgian capital.

At the head of the list of American wheat exporters, fourth in total volume of exports, came Julius Barnes. It is interesting to note that Mr. Barnes, in addition to the Barnes-Ames Co., controls eight other subsidiary corporations, according to the Federal Trade Commission—the Barnes-Irwin Co., the Barnes-Jackson Co., the Barnes-Pizaaek Co., the Itasca Elevator Co., the Neil Grain Co., Smyth, Barnes & Co. (this Mr. Barnes operates as an English concern), the Zenith Grain Co. (Canadian), and the Nye & Jenks Grain Co.

Just to give a clearer picture of the way the Barnes influence spreads throughout the grain-marketing structure in this and other countries, it is interesting to note that, according to the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. Barnes controls, in addition to those enumerated above, nine other companies subsidiary to the Nye & Jenks Grain Co. These are the Trans-Atlantic Brokerage & Export Co., New York; Rialto Elevator Co., Milwaukee, Wis.; Independent Grain & Lumber Co., Mason City, Iowa; Nye-Schneider-Fowler Grain Co., Omaha, Nebr.; Central Granaries Co., Lincoln, Nebr.; Nebraska Elevator Co., Lincoln, Nebr.; Thresher Fuller Grain Co., Kansas City, Mo.; Nye, Jenks & Co., Minneapolis, Minn.; and the Nye-Schneider-Jenks Co., Omaha, Nebr.

Here we have a picture of the grain-exporting situation. Nearly half our export wheat handled by foreign concerns; only a handful of Americans engaged in the grain-exporting business at best, and that handful interlocked and interrelated and permeated with the influence of Julius Barnes. This is the group that is making the most noise and opposition to the McNary-Haugen bill, and this is the group whose interests Congress is asked to consider as more important than the interests of millions of farmers who now suffer from impaired purchasing power largely due to discriminatory legislation.

These grain exporters do not require much more in the way of physical equipment than an office and a desk. Their operating capital need not be large. The Federal Trade Commission report said:

> Trading in grain, including the sale of grain to the foreign buyer, does not require extensive physical equipment, and therefore does not call for any considerable capital in permanent form. While some merchants physically handle and store the grain, thus requiring the use of considerable capital, others, many of them among the largest grain merchants, do not so handle the grain. Hence, a large proportion of the capital of the grain merchant may consist of working capital which may be in the form of borrowings secured by grain.

In his utterances against the McNary-Haugen bill Julius Barnes has been careful to have himself quoted as president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. In view of his widespread and peculiar interests in the grain-exporting business, as shown by the report of the Federal Trade Commission previously referred to, I submit that it would be more straightforward, and certainly more comprehensible, if Mr. Barnes would explain his interest in the McNary-Haugen measure now pending by a frank statement that he is the leading American grain exporter.

In a very informal talk before a considerable group of Congressmen and their wives one evening last week Secretary of Agriculture Wallace said that some way must be found to make clear to the people in the industrial sections and in the cities, especially the East, just what has happened and is happening to the farmers of the mid-West and far West, where our great surplus agricultural crops are produced. He said he thought that if the people of the cities and industrial centers could once understand the seriousness of the agricultural situation they would be just as anxious as the people of the West to do something to relieve a condition which is a real menace to the Nation. He said:

Surely everyone will agree that Government must secure and maintain economic justice among the various producing groups. At the present time a very large percentage of the farmers of the Nation are the victims of economic injustice, in part at least due to Government action. Farmers greatly extended their production to help win the war. They went in debt to buy additional equipment, to enlarge their cultivated acreage, to add improvements which would not otherwise have been added, to buy machinery which would not otherwise have been bought, and to vote taxes which would not otherwise have been voted, to buy Government bonds, and to pay high prices for labor. They were assured that they could produce with assurance that they would be able to sell all they might produce at prices sufficient to make them whole. Until the summer of 1920 prices of farm products in general sold high enough to cover enlarged production costs. In 1920 the prices of most farm products dropped perpendicularly to figures far below the bare cost of production, without taking into account added expense in the way of taxation, increased freight rates, and other fixed items of expense. The Government was responsible in considerable part for the agricultural inflation and was responsible in part for the drop in farm prices. To say that the Government's responsibility was due to the needs of war may explain but does not relieve the situation in which the farmer finds himself.

When we remember that about a third of our people live on the farm, surely it must be evident to every thinking citizen that if we compel that third to continue for any considerable length of time under gross economic injustices things are going to happen which good citizens do not want to see happen. Speaking generally, the best farmers are those who have been hit the hardest, because it was they who responded most cheerfully to war demands. The idea that any considerable number of farmers are in trouble because of unwise speculation or of inefficiency is wrong. The number of those is very small. But hundreds of thousands of good, hard-working farmers who have farmed efficiently, avoided speculation, worked hard, and managed their farms wisely have seen their savings of a lifetime swept away and have lost their farm homes through no fault of their own.

This is a situation to challenge the attention of every thoughtful statesman. Bankers, manufacturers, and business men generally in the agricultural regions of the mid-West and West are close enough to see what is happening, but similar groups in the East do not seem to understand either what is happening or the results which are bound to follow unless this agricultural trouble is remedied very soon.

The farmers of America have been the balance wheel from the beginning of our national life. They have sent a steady stream of fresh blood into the cities. They have thought clearly on every national problem, and especially on the great economic and social problems which make for sound and stable government. No greater mistake can be made than to permit this basic group to continue under such drastic conditions as have prevailed for the past three years.

Statistics show that, if we except those regions in which there is a considerable excess of foreign population, the number of births in most of the cities of the eastern half of the United States is not sufficient to even maintain our population. Aside from immigration our population is growing through increase on the farms and in those urban and industrial sections in which foreign nationalities are preponderant. The farmers produce more than half a million surplus children each year. These children spend their character-forming years on the farms, and move into the cities as they reach maturity.

The sort of citizens they make depends upon home conditions and educational and religious opportunities. Conditions such as have prevailed upon the farms for three years past are making it necessary for the children to work as soon as they are large enough to work. A large percentage of them are being deprived of those educational, social, and religious opportunities which are so necessary to the making of good citizens. Schools and churches are being closed in many regions. The people of the cities from their own selfish standpoint could afford to pay at least 40 per cent of the cost of furnishing educational opportunities to the young folks now on the farms rather than allow present conditions to continue, for these young folks will make the citizens of the next generation.

There is still another phase of this situation which is of selfish interest to the people of the cities. The fertility of the soil is our greatest material national asset. It will not be many years until our population will be large enough to consume all of the farm products we are now producing, and as time goes on our troubles will be due not to an agricultural surplus but to the high cost of food. During the past three or four years the farmer's income has not been large enough to enable him to keep up his producing plant. His machinery is deteriorating, his buildings, his fences, and other improvements. The need for producing cash crops and the high price of seeds has prevented him from following those systems of rotation which are necessary to keep the land in good heart. We are eating into the fertility of the soil, our capital asset, at a rate which the Nation can not afford, looking to future needs. This is a matter of even greater concern to the consuming public than to the producer.

Some way must be found to assure to the farmer his fair share of the national income. Some way must be found to bring the farmer into fair economic relations with other essential groups. The advice of the classical economist to let things alone on the theory that economic laws will bring about a normal balance is bad, and never so bad as at the present time. Ways have been found to protect other groups from the brutal operations of these economic laws, and ways must be found to give the farmer equal protection.

Our sympathies are aroused when we hear of a famine in any part of the world, and we give freely of our money to feed the starving people. If we should follow the advice of the cold-blooded economist, instead of feeding starving people we should let them die on the theory that the consequent reduction in population would restore economic balance and there would then be food enough for all.

The people of the United States can not afford to permit agriculture to continue in its present state. It is not a question of showing favoritism to the farmer. It is not a question of giving the farmer something at the expense of other groups. The question is to see to it that the farmer has justice; that he has equal opportunity with the commerce, the business, the industrial, the financial, and the transportation groups—even-handed justice—no more, no less. It is a great national problem, upon the satisfactory solution of which national welfare depends.

During this period of acute agricultural depression hundreds of farms have passed out of the ownership of farmers and into the hands of nonfarmers. This movement is growing rather than lessening. We are feeling the cumulative effect of low prices and lessened income. It is not good for the country that the land should be owned by a nonresident landlord class. That tends toward rack rents, lower standards of living, exploitation of the soil, and peasantry.

The fostering of a sound agriculture is a Government duty, and present conditions demand courageous action, even if it may be necessary to adopt heretofore untried methods.

The following letter has been sent to Members of the House and Senate by representatives of farm organizations who are in Washington supporting the McNary-Haugen export corporation bill. In addition to the men and organizations signatory to this letter, over 300 other farm organizations, as well as many hundreds of commercial and professional associations, have indorsed the measure:

During the recent press comment on the McNary-Haugen bill, the statement has frequently been made that the present Congress will not adjourn without passing some kind of farm legislation, and the only inference which can be drawn from such statements is that if Congress can not see its way clear to give the farmer what he wants, then it will give him something it thinks he ought to have. And we, the undersigned, who represent the largest and the most representative farm organizations of the country, believe that the time has come when we should make our position in these premises clear to Congress and to the whole Nation—and therefore without the slightest semblance of threat but with an overwhelming conviction of the gravity of the situation which now confronts the farmer, we want to make it perfectly plain that no mere legislative palliative can save agriculture from the collapse which now impends, which has already forced tens of thousands of the best farmers in the land into bankruptcy and which at this hour menaces tens of thousands of other farmers with the same catastrophe.

The single and solitary purpose of the McNary-Haugen bill is to give to the farmer as big a dollar for the products of his toil during the next five years as the dollar that he is forced to pay to industry under the Fordney-McCumber Act and to labor under the existing generous wage scales, and in all candor we desire to ask of Congress and of the country, Is there anything unfair about this proposal? Can the farmer be expected, on the one hand, to bear a large share of the burdens imposed by industry and labor who have created living conditions of their own liking—and then, on the other hand, accept a price for his wheat, hogs, cattle, and other surplus farm commodities, at home and abroad, established in competition with the peasant and peon farmers of the whole world? If the American manufacturer is unwilling to meet the foreign manufacturer on an even footing, and if labor believes that the time for absolute exclusion with reference to immigration has come, then should they ask the six and a half million farmers of this country to do what they themselves refuse to do?

Through the McNary-Haugen bill we have approached this situation as best we knew how. For four long, weary months this measure has stood the fire of the opposition before the House and Senate committees and during this time we have sought to cure every fair and valid objection made against its various provisions. Therefore we have a firm conviction that the measure as it now stands is legally sound, practical, and workable. Nevertheless if any Member of Congress can, in good faith, propose any further amendment that will make it more so and yet subserve the full purpose which the act has in view, then we shall most cordially welcome such assistance—for certainly we want it to be sound and workable and certainly also we do not want to take a penny out of the Federal Treasury that is not returned, for we are asking Congress to help us save agriculture from impending ruin. We are not asking for charity. But if after placing ourselves in this friendly and conciliatory attitude Congress should still see fit to deny our petitions, then we shall go back home and save as much out of the wreck as we can.

In the meantime let Congress and the whole country understand that the day of soft-soaping agriculture is past—that in this hour when the average farmer is struggling for his very existence it would be an insult to offer him a mere legislative nostrum that does not honestly and fairly seek to relieve him of the tremendous handicap under which he is laboring. In all kindness but nevertheless with profound firmness we therefore say, give us the McNary-Haugen bill, for agriculture is unable to accept a substitute.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, when my friend, A. D. Cross, of Spokane, Wash., wrote the letter to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] I do not believe that he thought his letter was going to be used as it was. He is for cooperative marketing. So am I. Here is the closing paragraph of a letter from Mr. Cross, written to me on the 10th of this month:

I desire to thank you for your earnest work on behalf of the McNary-Haugen bill, and we hope it will pass—as there is no conflict between it and the Curtis-Aswell bill. The former is an emergency measure and the latter for permanent relief.

It is signed "A. D. Cross, secretary of the Farmers' Union, State of Washington."

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] stopped the Clerk before he concluded the reading of Mr. Cross's letter. The impression was given that Mr. Cross opposes the McNary-Haugen bill, whereas, speaking for the farmers' union, of which I have been a member for 15 years, he says, "We hope it will pass."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this legislation. It is admitted by even those who opopse it that it will furnish some relief to the farmers of the country. But the charge is that it is not economically sound.

I have listened with much interest to this debate. The farmers of the country are earnestly urging the passage of the legislation, and if we may judge by the attitude of their Representatives on the floor some business sections of the country are opposing the legislation.

I listened with much interest to the reading of a letter submitted by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], and while this letter was supposed to oppose this legislation, I thought I could well understand that the writer was urging in the strongest terms possible the immediate relief the passage of the legislation would give to the farmers of the United States.

Now, that my friend the gentleman from Washington, Doctor SUMMERS, has read the last clause in the letter, it appears that the writer indorses the bill under consideration and asks for its support.

The legislation under consideration, I believe, will do much to relieve the farmers of the country of their present distressed condition, and knowing the need of aid for these farmers at the present time, I want to urge as earnestly as I may the passage of this legislation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] on yesterday condemned this legislation in no unmistakable terms, and his condemnation of it was not because it would not improve the condition of the farmer, but because he claimed that his constituents would be required to pay an additional price for these farm products.

I want to quote briefly from his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday.

We do want agriculture to prosper. We will help it in every reasonable way; but what we say is that its prosperity should be in the main left to the working of laws of economics that are never defied without disaster.

From his speech, further on, I quote the following:

What is our remedy? Why, the natural remedy, the remedy of nature herself. The remedy of the competitive system; the remedy of the laws of economics.

In other words, he tells us let the farmer work out his own salvation. I take it from his argument he desires to purchase the farm products as cheaply as possible, and he believes this legislation will increase the price of farm products. Therefore he opposes it vigorously. But how does this principle work when it is transferred to the State of Massachusetts? When a tariff bill is before the House for consideration the gentleman from Massachusetts is here begging and imploring Congress to protect the great industries of New England against the cheap manufactured products of the world, and the industries of Massachusetts by this tariff are protected, and I dare say the gentleman from Massachusetts would admit that it is for the purpose of maintaining a price at which these institutions can manufacture their products at a reasonable profit.

The farmers of the United States now find themselves without protection and without an adequate market for their products. And they are unable to carry on their business at the prices they are receiving for their products.

What is good for the great industries in Massachusetts by way of protection is good for the farmer of the United States. And the gentleman from Massachusetts should be broad enough to see that the industries of the East can not long prosper while the farmers of the country are raising their products without profit. In other words, my view is that the best condition possible for the industries of Massachusetts is for the farmers of the country to be prosperous.

The farmers of the country are earnestly asking Congress to furnish them with relief from their present condition. And this legislation is before us for consideration and, as I view it, it is the only legislation that will be brought before us for consideration at this session. And if this measure is defeated at this time we will be unable to furnish the much-needed relief asked for by the farmers of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, for 15 hours we have been debating this great question. On behalf of the committee I wish to extend their thanks for the splendid attendance that has been given us.

During these closing moments of the debate I call attention to the fact that on the 7th of June, in a few days, to be exact just 15 days from now, will come to an end the present session of Congress. There is absolutely no chance to get legislation for agriculture unless you act now and act favorably upon this measure. It is up to you. For five months or more we have given our time and attention to this piece of legislation. We have brought it to you. It is yours now to do with as you please, but I wish you to remember that when you wend your way homeward after the closing hour, after the gavel falls in this Chamber and in the other, you must meet face to face the farmers of America.

They have been asking for this legislation. If you voted for it, good and well. If you voted against it, what can you say? Can you say to the American farmer that you voted against the bill in the hope that some other measure could be brought in? You know that within 15 days there can not be brought into this House or into the Senate Chamber a perfected piece of legislation to give to the farmer any manner of relief. So I say to you, most kindly and yet most emphatically, that it is the McNary-Haugen bill, the bill the farmer wants, the bill he is asking for, or it is no legislation at all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9033, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 23, 1924.

THE M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL—"WHO KILLED COCK ROBIN?"

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as a sort of aftermath of the defeat of the McNary-Haugen bill, a large-sized United States map has been brought into the lobby, at the top of which is pinned the legend "Who killed Cock Robin?" This map has been recolored to show the sections of the country from which support and from which opposition to the McNary-Haugen bill came. This map, which has been fixed up since the defeat of the bill, has no reference, of course, to any pending legislation. It is political. It is to be used in the coming campaign in an effort on the part of the administration to escape responsibility for not having enacted farm relief legislation. Practically the entire cotton-producing section of the South is included in the area of first-degree responsibility. The mental impression intended to be conveyed by this map is to locate responsibility away from the party in power. Otherwise there could be no point or purpose to it.

I do not ordinarily participate in partisan discussions. I realize the desperate straits to which this administration is driven after all the brave words and mighty promises, but it is neither brave nor fair to hide behind a doctored-up map and arouse prejudice in order to escape responsibility.

The Congress is adjourning. Nothing has been done. An excuse must be offered. Words fail; hence the trick map. It is to answer the question, "Who killed Cock Robin?" It is hoped that the grain and meat producers in their indignation that the Southern States—all agricultural and Democratic—which did not support the McNary-Haugen bill, will forget that the Republican Party is in power and in responsibility in both the House and in the Senate and in the White House. It is hoped they may not stop to consider that this McNary-Haugen bill did not propose the slightest relief to the southern farmers, but, on the contrary, proposed an added burden on the farmers of the Southern States, many of whom are in the greatest distress.

It is hoped, no doubt, they may not inquire into the history of this bill and learn that the committee which framed the bill knew when it was being framed the South could not support it and that it was reported to the House over the protest of representatives from the South on that committee. An examination of the provisions of the bill discloses that if the administration had deliberately set about to frame a bill with the purpose of excluding the possibility of southern support it could not have succeeded better than in this McNary-Haugen bill. The purpose to do that is not charged, but the bill discloses the fact. That is bad enough, but to label this bill as the real Cock Robin, deceased, which would have scratched away all the troubles of the wheat and meat producers, and in the solemn presence of that dead bird point an accusing finger at the South, inquiring, "Who killed Cock Robin?" and answer that question with this trick map, is not justified even by the dire extremities of these map fixers. It is not a mere matter of partisan or of personal politics which is involved. It is the possibility of mutual hurt.

It is not constructive statesmanship to propose a one-sided farm-relief measure which gives to one section of the country no share in its benefits, but actually proposes a new burden, get the bill defeated, and then offers for not having done anything an excuse calculated to arouse an unwarranted prejudice which would prevent concert of action among agricultural sections in those matters where there is community of interests.

Let us see about this. The general plan of this bill—I speak of it as of before its defeat—is to advance from the Federal Treasury $200,000,000, to be administered by a Government board in the purchase, in its discretion, of certain enumerated commodities where there is an export surplus and the domestic price is below the average commodity price based upon the average of those prices during the years 1905 to 1914, both inclusive. Through the operation of the tariff the embargo, if necessary, and the purchases made for export domestic prices are to be raised until they reach the point of the average relative commodity price. The surplus purchased is to be sold abroad, dumped, and the loss from such sales and the cost of administration deducted from the receipts from original domestic sales.

That is the general plan of the bill. Aside from any questions as to economic or governmental soundness, the selection of the years 1905 to 1914, inclusive, as the basis for price fixing, while applicable and acceptable to the meat and grain sections, was impossible as to cotton, for this clear reason: Since the years 1905 to 1914, inclusive, carried in the bill as the basis for determining all prices to be paid by the Government board, 1909 being the average thereof, the boll weevil has established itself throughout the entire cotton-producing area. There is not a person to any degree familiar with the increased cost, the increased hazard, of cotton production resulting from the advent of the boll weevil who has the slightest idea that cotton can now or ever again, as long as that pest remains, be produced on the basis of the same relative average commodity price received for cotton during the 10 years 1905 to 1914, inclusive. In other words, cotton farmers having to fight this pest and bear the loss in yield would be destroyed from the increased production cost per bale and decreased yield long before prices had shrunk to the point where contact with the provisions of the McNary-Haugen bill would be established. I raised this question at the first meeting of Members called to receive an explanation of the bill and was told no consideration could be given to this new element in production cost. I am not criticizing for not doing this. I am criticizing for trying to lay responsibility upon the South after this policy was adopted which excluded it from any further interest in the bill except as to its adverse features.

The wheat and meat farmer suffers from the ravages of prices relatively lower than those of 1905 to 1914; the cotton farmer from yield lower than those years. In each of the sections there are vast areas of acute distress resulting from these causes. Many cotton farmers for three years in succession, after the entire expense of cultivation, have suffered almost total and many of them total loss of their crops. In some sections whole counties have been largely depopulated. The only effect of this bill, in so far as they are concerned, would be to increase the price of the meat and grain products which they must buy. Of course, we are sympathetic with the meat and grain farmers, but we can not vote this added burden on our people in a bill which brings no relief to them. We can not stand an increase of production cost. We must sell two-thirds of our cotton abroad, handicapped as we are by the boll weevil and the tariff-boosted, trust-manipulated prices which we must pay. We must have cheaper cost of production if we are to meet world competition with this handicap. Why, may I ask these map fixers, should southern Representatives vote an increased cost on our people to help those who will not help us and will not help themselves to reduce this cost so that we may all have a fairer chance to compete with the world, as both of us must?

Aside from that, we know that we can never depend on any arbitrary arrangement under which domestic buyers of the one-third of our cotton would be forced by law to pay us enough to absorb a loss on the two-thirds sold abroad, the cost of administering, and in addition pay us a profit on the entire crop. The people would not stand for it. An attempt to proceed in that direction would be a foolish gesture. However, there was no such proposition. While the bill originally included the word "cotton" it excluded the staple by the failure to include as a price-fixing element the influence upon production cost caused by the boll weevil. We do not complain at that. But after this sort of treatment, why lay responsibility at our door for the failure of this administration to frame a bill we could support?

"Who killed Cock Robin?" If our friends can get by with this "Who killed Cock Robin" business, they will have something to brag about in the cloakrooms for many days to come. Who did "kill Cock Robin"? The fact is, nobody "killed Cock Robin" in the House. It was dead when it was brought in. From the time of the solemn entry of the pallbearers it was only a question as to when the obsequies would take place. As a matter of fact, it was not a "Cock Robin" at all. It was not even a little female robin. All that could be told for certain was that it was a dead bird over which a preelection wake was being held. A good many people thought it looked like a little gosling which had died in its shell.

And now the party in power and in responsibility in both Houses of Congress and at the White House, having failed utterly to enact farm-relief legislation, is seeking to use this map to divert resentment from the administration and from the party in power to a group of Southern States, Democratic in their affiliation, which this administration saw to it—I do not charge the purpose—were excluded from any chance to cooperate in passing the legislation which it brought to the floor of the House. It is said that all is fair in war and in politics. I challenge that statement.

It may be that some support was expected from certain other sections of the country, especially from the manufacturing sections. For generations the farmers of the wheat and meat producing sections have had the doctrine preached to them, largely by their own representatives in Congress, that if they would agree to an artificial increase in price of the products of the cities, the people of the cities would have more money with which to buy the products of the farm. They have accepted and devoutly supported that doctrine, but when the wheat and meat producers sought, in the advocacy of this bill, to return the argument that if the manufacturing cities would agree to an artificial increase in the price of the products of the farm, and only up to the point of average commodity value, the farmer would have more money to buy the products of the manufacturing city, the city folks, to use a bit of expressive slang, "gave them the horse laugh."

It may be true that "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander" but these preachers of the doctrine referred to seem to reason that it does not follow that what has made the "goose" sick would be good for the "gander." They would not take their own medicine. It was a very embarrassing moment for these gentlemen who have been peddling this medicine around, doping up the wheat and meat farmers, just when these farmers are getting suspicious as to its efficacy, to have those for whom they have been peddling it refuse to taste it just a little bit to show that they did not regard it as injurious to the system. It was disconcerting to say the least. It is enough to start them off trying to find out "Who killed Cock Robin?"

Maybe these gentlemen are to be excused for this map stunt. There is possibly not much else left in the present circumstances for the administration which is in power and in responsibility in the House, in the Senate, and in the White House to do except to get a lot of trick maps and go about the country crying out: "Cock Robin is dead; who killed Cock Robin?" But we are sorry that it has seemed to be necessary to lay the blame and responsibility in substantial part at the door of a group of agricultural States excluded from consideration of providing for them an additional burden upon production.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6202, to amend sections 11 and 12 of the merchant marine act of 1920, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Whereas there has been enacted into law since the close of the Great War a new national defense act, under whose provisions a policy of preparedness has been provided for; and

Whereas a reserve force of our citizens, known as the Organized Reserves, has been made a part of our military forces; and

Whereas the National Guard of the State has been brought into closer connection with the War Department so that the Army now consists of three components, the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves; and

Whereas it is important that proper funds be appropriated for the training of the two civilian components, namely, the National Guard and the Organized Reserves, the men and officers receiving no pay excepting on active duty; and

WORLD COURT

Mr. LODGE. I send to the desk a letter which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading. It is a letter from Chandler P. Anderson relating to the proposed World Court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

[Published in the New York Times, May 16, 1924]

MAY 13, 1924.

The EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

In Mr. Wickersham's letter in the New York Times to-day, replying to my letter of May 10 about the proposed world court, he says in conclusion that the real trouble with this "improved plan" is that "it can not be expected to meet with the approval of any of the nations which have united in the formation of the existing court."

I do not know by what authority Mr. Wickersham speaks for the members of the league, but I doubt that they will find the proposed changes as unacceptable as he believes.

As to the proposed jurisdiction amendment, he says that it is not intended that the court should have jurisdiction over "all matters especially provided for in treaties and conventions in force" unless they are referred to it by the parties. If that is true, could any member of the court have any objection to amending the provision as proposed, in order to avoid any possible future misunderstanding on this point?

He also admits that so far as the United States is concerned the submission of a case must be by special agreement which has received the approval of the Senate. That being true, what objection can there be to an express statement of this condition, which is invariably stated in all arbitration treaties made by the United States?

As to the proposal that the court should not render advisory opinions concerning questions which the United States considers are of purely domestic concern, he remarks that the court is not obliged to render any advisory opinion, and he points out that it recently refused to render an advisory opinion in a controversy between Finland and Russia. He may be interested to know that the principal reason why the court refrained from rendering an advisory opinion in that case was because "the Russian Government absolutely repudiated the claim of the so-called League of Nations to intervene in the question of the internal situation of Carelia and stated that any attempt on the part of any power to apply to Russia the article of the covenant of the league relating to disputes between one of its members and a non-participating State would be regarded by the Russian Government as an act of hostility to the Russian State."

Does any member of the League of Nations think that it is advisable to invite a rebuff of this character, or that it tends to international good feeling to force a nation into such a hostile attitude in order to prevent interference with its domestic concerns?

Mr. Wickersham takes me to task for pointing out that his statement that the whole world, except the United States, Russia, Ecuador, and Mexico were in the league court is incorrect, because Germany, among other States, is not a member of that court. He retorts that Germany was a party to a recent case before the court, and that a German judge sat as a temporary member of the court in that case. The case he refers to is the steamship Wimbledon, and Mr. Wickersham will find, if he examines the decision of the court, that in that case Germany was not there voluntarily, but because compulsory jurisdiction of the court over that case was imposed upon Germany by the provisions of articles 380 and 386 of the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. Wickersham will also be interested to learn that, in addition to the United States, Russia, Ecuador, Mexico, and Germany and her former ally, Turkey, 9 other States have not signed the protocol for the court, and 11 States which signed the protocol have not ratified it. These States comprise nearly all of Latin America, including the five Central American Republics, also Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Columbia, Dominican Republic, Paraguay, and Peru. Thus there are 25 States in addition to the United States which have not become members of the league court, and many of these are members of the League of Nations.

Mr. Wickersham further criticizes the "improved plan" on the ground that it is not a reorganization of the league court, but a new and independent creation. It does not appear on what authority he makes this statement, but if he will examine the proposed plan he will find that it is required to be submitted to a third Hague conference, and it will rest with the States participating to decide whether the proposed world court should be an entirely new court or a transformation of the league court into a world court. It is distinctly stated in the plan that "the simplest solution would be to separate the existing court from the control of the League of Nations and establish it independently by a new international convention, without destroying its identity, but making the changes required by its new status." It would seem that this question could appropriately be decided by the nations themselves, when the proposal is submitted to them.

Mr. Wickersham dissents from my statement that "if any court is to make laws for the world, it should be a world court, and not the league court." That would seem to be a perfectly self-evident proposition, and certainly the burden is on Mr. Wickersham to show the contrary, and how the United States would fare better in the league court than in the world court. But he has not troubled himself to argue the question thus raised.

On this point, I recommend to Mr. Wickersham's attention the following statements made by Dr. David J. Hill in the Saturday Evening Post last August:

> "It is not humanly possible for a court constituted as the Permanent Court of International Justice is constituted—every judge except one belonging to a nation that is a member of the league—not to defend the interests of the league as such. If there were any doubt on this point it should be removed by the fact that the court is the official adviser of the league in legal questions, the greater part of its work thus far having been the rendering of opinions regarding the league's activities. * * * So long as the Permanent Court of International Justice is in any sense dependent upon the league for its existence, being chosen, paid, and pensioned by it, the judges must support the league and will inevitably be controlled by the league's law. No doubt the league—that is, the council and assembly—will not give orders to the court. That is unnecessary. The orders are already in the covenant of the league, which assigns its proper rôle to each of the league's organs and will determine the policy of all of them, because it is their fundamental law. Their community of interest lies in helping the league to prevail in order, as Lord Robert Cecil has expressed it, that the league 'may become the sole international authority in Europe and the world.'"

As illustrating the reluctance of the league to participate with the rest of the world in the development and codification of international law, I cited in my last letter the refusal of the league to call a third Hague conference for that purpose, as recommended by the committee of jurists which drafted the league court plan. Mr. Wickersham undertakes to explain the league's refusal to adopt this recommendation by showing that Mr. Root, who was a member of that committee, stated in 1921 that the time was not then ripe for such a conference.

That was in 1921, however, and nothing has since been done about it by the league. The failure of the league to act is a reason for, rather than against, reopening the question of calling a third Hague conference, as proposed by the Lodge resolution.

Mr. Wickersham's objection to establishing any legal principles to control the decisions of the court is admirably answered by the following extracts from an editorial in the American Journal of International Law for April, 1923, by Prof. Charles Noble Gregory (one of the editors of that Journal). Speaking of the league court, he said:

> "The large conclusion as to the future course of this very high tribunal which is suggested with much force is that it will evolve such juristic rules and conceptions as it sees fit, controlled by no code and but little if at all limited by judicial precedent or scholastic opinion. If it is called to deal with such international questions as may be discerned in the offing, even by our somewhat short-sighted and optimistic statesmen, it is apparent that it will probably register in perfect good faith and with supreme confidence, exclusively the views and policies of Europe. What those views and policies will prove to be as to the rights of Indian, Japanese, and Chinese nationals on our shores, in our schools, in our lands, and in a claim, always appealing, for equal treatment, who can say? In the matter of enemy's property and the vast sums claimed in relation thereto, in the matter of international debts which are owed to us in billions by the countries to which these judges belong, who can foresee their conclusions or anticipate their decisions?
> "If they are hostile to the interests of this country and contrary to those views of justice and equity which we have so long assimilated, how can they be reviewed or corrected? No means is apparent and even an advisory opinion will operate as compulsive. * * * "Under the above circumstances, the friendly eye of the international student must look to the uncharted course of the high tribunal with real solicitude. He must wish for it not only exalted powers of intellect, but a spirit of equally exalted and disinterested devotion to justice, which can not be said to be universal in international action. He must hope that these nebulous, unfenced, and expansive powers will not engulf and destroy the safeguards which the long, brave, and successful struggle of our race and our country for freedom and self-government has fashioned and until now maintained."

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia North American of date May 21, 1924, entitled "For nullification."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the request of the Senator from Idaho is granted.

The editorial is as follows:

FOR NULLIFICATION

Many Americans were astonished, it appears, by Nicholas Murray Butler's recent speech denouncing prohibition, the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the Volstead Act, and demanding restoration of a legalized liquor traffic. But while such an utterance from a distinguished educator is deplorable, the incident surely provided no occasion for surprise. Doctor Butler has long been foremost among the advocates of the booze cause. So far back as January of last year he diverted the country by a similar declaration. Then his argument for liquor was that the law was being disobeyed by "large numbers of highly intelligent and morally sensitive people." During the interval his views have not grown more logical but merely more violent. Now he urges abandonment of the law upon the ground that it promotes immorality and crime; besides making lawbreakers among the "highly intelligent and morally sensitive," he contends it is corrupting innocent young persons by inciting them to defiance, and is putting the brand of criminality upon bootleggers who ought to be self-respecting, tax-paying, law-abiding, licensed rum sellers.

Doctor Butler, of course, has other titles to fame besides his fanatical hatred of prohibition. As president of Columbia University he is noted in the scholastic world, having been the recipient of literally dozens of honorary degrees from institutions of learning in this country and in Europe. He has been for many years a leading figure in the councils of the Republican Party, and has been insatiable in pursuit of political prominence and public office. At several national conventions he has been a member of the committee on resolutions. Four years ago the New York delegation gave him a complimentary ballot for the presidential nomination. In 1912 he was the nominee for Vice President and shared with Mr. Taft the distinction of rolling up 8 electoral votes.

In the address which he delivered at a banquet of the Missouri Society in New York City on April 29 he stated his case in these terms:

> "Shocking and immoral conditions have been brought about by the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution and the legislation enacted pursuant to its provisions. The amendment itself is not only a violation of the principles upon which our Government rests but a revolutionary departure from them. The American people will not long permit this condition to continue without emphatic and effective revolt.
> "As a result of the eighteenth amendment we now have a nation-wide traffic in intoxicating liquors which is unlicensed, illicit, illegal, and untaxed. We have multiplied many times the saloon. We have brought about a situation in which we challenge the ingenuity and the sporting instinct of millions of young persons to test whether or not they can safely violate a law for which they have no respect. We have invited and induced a spirit and a habit of lawlessness which are quite without precedent. * * *
> "The reason why the national prohibition law is not enforced is that it can not be enforced. The reason why it can not be enforced is that it ought not to have been passed. In its attempted interference with the food and drink and medicine of the people, it is a form of oppression to which a free people will never submit in silence. The immoral conditions which have followed the ratification of the amendment are the natural results of its own immorality. * * * Men and women of religious faiths, of moral principle and of public spirit should face the terrible facts that confront them. * * * A burning moral issue has been raised by the results of the prohibition policy. That issue is whether the American people will have the courage to strike from their Constitution and their statute books the hateful cause of all this demoralization."

This remarkable statement of perverted facts and false deductions has been hailed with delight by the liquor interests and all the forces of lawlessness, both the morally sensitive and the callously commercial, and it has been unsparingly denounced by supporters of the law and the Constitution. Many of these latter express amazement that such destructive sentiments should emanate from a man who is head of a great institute of learning and the counselor of youth. There is, however, nothing in Doctor Butler's record inconsistent with his fury against a measure of economic and social and moral progress. In public affairs he has always been a sodden reactionary, a defender of special privilege and predatory interests, and a dependable spokesman for the most sordid elements in the Republican Party leadership.

Some of his opponents assail him severely for advocating repeal of the eighteenth amendment. This, we are sure, is not valid ground for criticism. Doctor Butler or any other citizen, if he believes that adoption of the amendment was a mistake and that its effects are injurious, has an unquestionable right to urge its repeal and to work for the accomplishment of that end through orderly processes. The spectacle of a man in his position condoning lawlessness and acting as special pleader for a discredited and outlawed traffic is, of course, gross in its impropriety. His misrepresentations may properly be censured and his judgment challenged. But these considerations do not impair his right to agitate for repeal, if he does so candidly.

The offense of Doctor Butler and his kind is that they are not honestly striving for repeal of the eighteenth amendment by the democratic methods through which it was made a part of the Constitution, but are working to bring about its nullification. There are certain infallible tests which determine the degree of sincerity in a man's hostility to the law.

The two main contentions offered by Doctor Butler are precisely those which are used by the bootleggers and by every agent of the liquor traffic, namely, that the law is an invasion of personal liberty and that it can not be enforced.

The first of these pleas was long ago worn threadbare. "Interference with the food and drink and medicine of the people" is not an unheard-of innovation; it is a commonplace function of law. If Doctor Butler doubts this, let him try to buy a trout out of season, or run a private still under a license law, or purchase a pound of opium. Personal liberty extends just to the point where its exercise inflicts social injury, and no further.

In asserting that the law can not be enforced, he speaks neither accurately nor honestly. For his statement is founded upon the premise that there have been genuine and efficient efforts to enforce the law, and no one knows better than Doctor Butler that this implication is false.

He knows that neither under Democratic nor Republican auspices has there been followed a sincere and determined purpose to apply the prohibition law. He knows that at the head of the bureau responsible for enforcement is an official who is hostile to the Volstead Act and whose first thought is to serve the politicians and their backers; that the enforcement officers and agents have been selected in most instances for political reasons, and have included former saloon keepers, bootleggers, and politicians serving the liquor interests; that the records of courts and congressional inquiries have revealed not merely official indifference and incompetence but flagrant corruption and betrayals of trust; that the law has been distorted in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, disregarded in the Department of Justice, and misinterpreted by prosecutors and judges. For Doctor Butler, in the face of these notorious conditions, to say that the law can not be enforced is an assumption which instantly raises doubts as to his good faith.

But another test has a graver effect upon his repute as a good citizen and an honest critic of prohibition. Straightforward advocacy of repeal of the eighteenth amendment is legitimate, provided it is based upon unswerving loyalty to the law and uncompromising support of its enforcement until it shall be repealed. Without these things agitation against the law has for its purpose not repeal but nullification. In his speech Doctor Butler said: "I shall obey these laws so long as they remain on the statute book." But this perfunctory remark was lost in the torrent of invective against the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act. The speaker is conspicuously one of the "highly intelligent and morally sensitive" class, and no one knows better than he that the effect of his sweeping denunciation of the amendment as an unconstitutional, immoral, and utterly indefensible enactment is to incite defiance of it.

"A year ago," says the United States attorney in New York, "Doctor Butler said disobedience of the law was not a crime, nor even reprehensible. Now he says the law can not be enforced, bewailing the fact that so many persons have taken his advice. He puts all the emphasis on repeal and none on the duty of obedience."

And Doctor Butler was not satisfied to assail the amendment as wrong in principle and unenforceable in practice. He had the effrontery to attribute to it all the lawlessness and criminality involved in its defiance.

Drinking, he finds, is no longer a vice, because it is done in violation of a statute which isn't popular, and he has an approving smirk for "the ingenuity and sporting instinct of young persons" who "violate a law for which they have no respect." Bootlegging and smuggling and the selling of poison booze are not the activities of criminals but "the natural results of the immorality of the eighteenth amendment." With precisely as much justification and honesty it could be argued that the antinarcotic law is responsible for the prevalence of dope peddling and drug addiction.

That the aim of the Butler movement is nullification, not repeal, is shown not only by his studied encouragement of law defiance but by his demand for modification of the Volstead Act, which "tells a conscious lie," he says, in defining as intoxicating any liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol.

Thus he gives support to the agitation for the legalizing of "light wines and beer." But he is perfectly aware that if Congress were to authorize the making of intoxicating beer the law would be invalid, for it would be in palpable violation of the eighteenth amendment. As for "light wines," the very term in this connection is a palpable fraud, since there is not a "light" wine containing less than 8 per cent of alcohol, and most of them contain double that amount. But if in this manner the Volstead Act can be broken down, then there will be no enforcement statute and the constitutional amendment will be nullified. And that is exactly the purpose behind the whole wretched scheme.

The enemies of prohibition are divided into three classes—first, honest advocates of repeal, who practice and support loyal observance of the law until repeal can be accomplished; second, the bootleggers, who methodically violate the law for gain; third, those who incite lawlessness while professing to deplore it and who make a false pretense of working for an impossible repeal while actually striving to achieve a possible nullification. And the tactics of the third group are by far the most dangerous and detestable.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7220) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McNARY, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. CAPPER, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. HARRIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement of the action of the conferees and the effect thereof on the revenue bill, H. R. 6715. There were six material matters on which the bill as amended by the Senate differed from the bill as passed by the House: The normal tax, the surtax, the exemptions, the corporation tax, the provisions as to publicity of returns, and the estate tax.

(1) The House bill provided for a normal tax on the income of individuals at the rate of 6 per cent, except that the rate on the first $4,000 was at the rate of 2 per cent and on the next $4,000 at the rate of 5 per cent. The Senate amended this provision to provide for a normal tax at the rate of 2 per cent on the first $4,000, 4 per cent on the next $4,000, and 6 per cent on the remainder. On this amendment the House recedes.

(2) The House bill provides for a surtax on the net income of individuals ranging from 1½ per cent of the net income in excess of $10,000 but not in excess of $12,000, to 37½ per cent of the net income in excess of $200,000. The Senate amended this section to provide for a surtax ranging from 1 per cent of the net income in excess of $10,000 but not in excess of $14,000 to 40 per cent of the net income in excess of $500,000. On this amendment the House recedes.

(3) The House bill provided for a personal exemption in the case of a married man and in the case of the head of a family of $2,500 if the net income of the individual were less than $5,000 and of $2,000 if the net income of the individual were in excess of $5,000. The Senate amendment provided for an exemption of $2,500 irrespective of the amount of the net income of the taxpayer. On this amendment the House recedes.

(4) The House bill provided a tax on the income of corporations at the rate of 12½ per cent and provided in addition for a capital stock tax on corporations of $1 for each $1,000 of the fair average value of the capital stock. The Senate amendment repealed the capital stock tax, reduced the normal tax on corporations to 9 per cent, and provided for a graduated tax on the undistributed net income of corporations ranging from one-fourth of 1 per cent to 40 per cent of such undistributed net income. On this amendment the Senate recedes.

(5) The House bill provided that the income-tax returns should be open to inspection only upon order of the President and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary and approved by the President, with special provisions for the inspection of returns by and the furnishing of information to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Finance of the Senate, a special committee of the Senate or House, the proper officers of any State, and the bona fide shareholders of record of a corporation. The Senate amendment provides that returns upon which the tax has been determined by the commissioner shall constitute public records and shall be open to examination and inspection as other public records. On this point the House recedes with an amendment restoring the provisions of the House bill with certain clerical changes and providing in addition that the commissioner shall have prepared and made available to public inspection in the office of the collector in each internal-revenue district and in such other places as he may determine lists containing the name and post-office address of each person making an income-tax return in such district, together with the amount of tax paid by such person.

(6) The House bill provided for an estate tax ranging from 1 per cent of the estate in excess of $50,000 but not in excess of $100,000 to 40 per cent of the amount of the estate in excess of $10,000,000. The Senate amendment provides for an inheritance tax ranging in the case of a direct heir from 1 per cent to 36 per cent of the amount of the inheritance in excess of $5,000,000; in the case of a collateral heir from 1 per cent to 45 per cent of the inheritance in excess of $5,000,000. On this amendment the House recedes with an amendment restoring the provisions of the House bill with certain clerical and unimportant technical changes.

In addition to the above there were other provisions as to which the Senate and House bills differed, which, although of less importance than those listed above, involve questions of policy. I shall list and explain the action of the conferees on these amendments.

The House bill provided that the amount by which the tax was reduced on account of capital loss should not exceed 12½ per cent of the loss. The Senate struck out this provision of the House bill, with the result that capital losses, the same as other losses, would be allowed in full as deductions. On this amendment the Senate recedes, and the provisions of the House bill are restored.

The House bill limited the amount which might be considered as earned income to $20,000. The Senate amendment reduced this amount to $10,000. On this amendment the House receded.

The House bill provided for a credit against the income tax of an individual of 25 per cent of the amount which bears the same relation to the total amount of the tax as the amount of the earned net income bears to the total amount of the net income. The Senate amendment provides for the crediting against the tax of 25 per cent of the amount of the tax which would be payable by the taxpayer on a total ordinary net income equal in amount to his earned net income, the effect of the Senate amendment being to consider the earned income as that income in the lower brackets in the case of a wealthy taxpayer, thus placing the taxpayer with a large income upon the same grounds in this respect as the taxpayer with a small income. On this amendment the House recedes with certain clerical changes.

The House bill provided that the deduction for interest paid on indebtedness—except indebtedness incurred in connection with the trade or business of the taxpayer—and the deduction for nonbusiness losses should be allowed as deductions in computing net income only if and to the extent that the sum of these amounts exceeds the income of the taxpayer from tax-exempt securities. The Senate amended the bill, striking out this provision on the ground that it was indirectly taxing the income from tax-exempt securities. On this amendment the House recedes.

The House bill provided that if any corporation is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of surtaxes upon its shareholders by permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being distributed, there should be assessed against such corporation a penalty of 25 per cent. The Senate amendment increased this penalty to 50 per cent. On this amendment the House recedes.

The House bill provided that in case of an additional assessment of income, war profits, excess profits, or estate taxes the taxpayer could appeal to the Board of Tax Appeals, but that in the event of an adverse decision by the board the taxpayer should sue in the courts for its recovery. The Senate amended this to require that the Government in the event that the taxpayer did not acquiesce in the decision of the board could collect the tax only by suit. On this amendment the Senate receded.

The House bill exempted from the tax upon the sale of automobile trucks or wagons those the selling price of the chassis of which is less than $1,000. The Senate added to this provision another provision exempting from the tax truck and wagon bodies selling for an amount not in excess of $200. On this amendment the House receded.

The House bill reduced the tax on automobile parts and accessories from 5 per cent to 2½ per cent. The Senate amendment struck out this tax entirely. The Senate recedes.

The House bill, as does the present law, imposed a tax upon certain sales of paintings, statuary, art porcelains, and bronzes. The Senate struck out this tax. On this amendment the Senate recedes.

The Senate inserted by amendment a provision in the House bill providing that the hearings before the Board of Tax Appeals shall be open to the public, that the testimony taken at the hearing shall be reduced to writing, that the board shall make a report in writing of its findings of fact and its opinion and decision in each case, that such report and all evidence received by the board shall be public records open to the inspection of the public, and shall be published at the Government Printing Office and sold in the same manner as other public documents. On this amendment the House recedes with an amendment, limiting the cases in which the oral testimony shall be reduced to writing and in which the board shall write an opinion to those cases in which the amount of tax in controversy exceeds $10,000.

The Senate amended the House bill to provide that if any part of an excise tax has been refunded to the taxpayer by the Government, such refund not being required by a decision of a court of competent jurisdiction, and if the articles, the sale of which was taxed, have passed from the possession of the taxpayer, the taxpayer should not again be assessed or taxed, or if he has been reassessed and taxed, the amount of the tax should be abated or refunded. The Senate recedes.

The Senate inserted by amendment a section providing for the exemption from the income tax imposed by the revenue act of 1916, the revenue act of 1917, the revenue act of 1918, and the revenue act of 1921, of farmers' or other mutual hail, cyclone, or fire insurance companies (if otherwise exempt under the provisions of such acts) whether or not such organizations are of a purely local character. The House recedes with an amendment making clerical changes.

The Senate inserted by amendment a provision for a reduction of the postal rates in the case of the portion of publications devoted to advertisements. On this amendment the Senate recedes.

The remainder of the amendments were clerical, technical, and comparatively unimportant. I shall, of course, however, be glad to explain the action of the conferees on any of the other amendments, if the Senate so desires.

Mr. President, I have had the Government Actuary make an estimate of the revenue that will be derived from the bill when in operation as compared with the expenditures of the Government based upon the recommendations of the Budget.

I may add that there has been confusion in the public mind as to the figures that have been published in this respect, and this only: Some figures have been published and have appeared in the press of the country, and I will say also have been used on the floor of the Senate by me and other members of the committee, applying sometimes to the fiscal year and at other times to the calendar year; and, of course, there is considerable difference in the amount of revenue that would be shown under those conditions.

For instance, for the fiscal year 1924 all of the revenue will be derived from rates of the existing law; but the fiscal year 1925 begins on July 1, 1924, and ends on June 30, 1925; so the fiscal year 1925 will be the first full fiscal year in which the revenues derived from the pending bill, if it becomes a law, will be collected.

I have here the estimates for the calendar years 1923, 1924, and 1925; but, as we make our appropriations for fiscal years instead of calendar years, in order that there may be no confusion in the minds of the public or in reading the RECORD on the part of those who do not carefully note that there is that difference, it seems to me the only thing to do is for us to confine ourselves to the fiscal year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Utah think it would be well for him to state that the income taxes of the year 1923–24 will be collected under the present law, and that the payments upon those incomes that are due after June 1 will be transferred to the fiscal year 1924–25?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think my statement before would be fairly construed in that way, but I am glad the Senator has made it perfectly plain.

Take the fiscal year 1924: The individual and corporation income tax is $1,899,000,000; the miscellaneous tax, $939,000,000. The total for the Internal Revenue Bureau—because they collect these taxes directly—would be, for that year, $2,838,000,000. The miscellaneous receipts—and I shall not take the time to name from what source they come, but they are all the miscellaneous receipts, special taxes, stamp taxes, and all other forms of taxes outside of the incomes of individuals and corporations—amount to $541,100,000; or, in other words, the total ordinary receipts for the fiscal year 1924—that is, the year ending June 30, 1924—will be $3,929,100,000. The expenditures chargeable against ordinary receipts, according to the estimate of December 9, 1923—and that was the last estimate which was given—are $3,565,040,000, which would leave an excess of ordinary receipts over expenditures chargeable against ordinary receipts of $364,060,000.

Senators, if they have followed this matter very closely, will remember that in the Secretary's report dated December 31, 1923, it was estimated that there would be a surplus of $329,000,000 instead of $364,060,000.

That increase in the surplus is largely made up in this way: It was given out generally and agreed to, not only by the Treasury Department but, I believe, by both Houses of Congress, that we would reduce the income taxes for the fiscal year 1924 25 per cent. The House passed that bill, but the Senate did not act upon it before March 15, the date when the first payment of taxes became due. After this bill was reported to the Senate the Treasury Department, at the request of a number of Senators, I am informed, desired to ascertain what effect that proposed 25 per cent reduction had upon the first payment of the taxes that fell due on March 15, 1924.

The examination is not complete yet, but it has gone far enough to demonstrate the fact that many of the taxpayers paid three-fourths of the tax, feeling quite certain that the payment of three-fourths of the tax on March 15 would in reality represent payment in full for the year. In other words, every year there are many taxpayers who pay all of their tax on March 15, so as not to be bothered about sending payments on June 15, September 15, and December 15; and the partial examination which has already been made shows that this year many of them sent 75 per cent of the amount of the tax, with the hope, of course, that the 25 per cent reduction for the fiscal year 1924 would take effect before the next payment became due in June, or any of the following payments. That, of course, increased the amount of surplus on hand at this particular time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question on that point? Where the taxpayer has paid the full amount of the tax already, what provision does the bill contain for the Government paying it back?

Mr. SMOOT. He gets a refund of 25 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does he get it in cash, or in the form of a credit on future taxes?

Mr. SMOOT. He will get it in cash as soon as the Treasury can pay it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does each taxpayer who has paid the full amount of his taxes have to make a personal application for a refund?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it is automatic.

Mr. SMOOT. It is automatic. The Treasury will return the money.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, when is the taxpayer to deduct his 25 per cent if he paid the first installment in full in March? Can he deduct it in June?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Treasury Department will decide that matter, and I think more than likely they will decide that it shall be deducted in June.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is a matter that will be handled by regulation of the Treasury Department?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any doubt but that that will be the case, just as it would have been the case if the bill had passed before March 15, granting a 25 per cent reduction.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think that has already been announced.

Mr. SMOOT. I so understand, but I did not want to be positive about it. That is my understanding, however. If this bill becomes a law, anyone that paid 25 per cent of the total tax for 1923 on the 15th of March will not have to pay the whole of the next 25 per cent that becomes due on June 15th.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In the House bill there was a provision on that subject which was accepted by the Senate, so that it was not in conference. That provides, in the case spoken of by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], that if the taxpayer has elected to pay in installments the amount of the discount on those installments which have been paid may be deducted from the next installment paid after the act goes into effect. The Senator will find the provision in full on page 370 of the new bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that that is mandatory; that the Secretary of the Treasury shall allow that amount if claimed?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it is provided in the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; it states there that—

> The amount so prorated to any installment, the date for payment of which has arrived—

That would be the March installment—> shall be credited against the installment next falling due after the enactment of this act.

In other words, if you have paid 25 per cent of your tax last March, you will deduct 50 per cent from the next installment, which is due in June.

Mr. BAYARD. What I have in mind is this: Assuming that some of the smaller taxpayers, as suggested by the Senator from Utah, had paid 100 per cent of the tax on March 15, 1924, they would be entitled to 25 per cent reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. Twenty-five per cent reduction.

Mr. BAYARD. Which they would not be in position to claim until the next fiscal year, would they?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, the department itself will refund that amount of money.

Mr. BAYARD. It will refund it to them?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; shortly after this bill becomes a law.

Mr. BAYARD. I thought application had to be made.

Mr. SMOOT. No; no application has to be made.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state the reason why I raised the question. The other day in the Claims Committee we had before us a bill to reimburse a person who had overpaid his tax, and the matter was not adjudicated or application was not made by the taxpayer until after the statute of limitations had run, and the question arose as to whether the Government, having received that money, should not repay it; and the principle involved here is somewhat similar. The Government having been overpaid by this operation I think direct mandatory provision should be made that the Government will give credit of its own motion.

Mr. SMOOT. It is, and they will send it back just as soon as the returns can be examined. They will have to be examined.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator may have given us the information—but if he did, I did not hear it—regarding the receipts from the income taxes as indicated by an examination of the returns which have been made with respect to this reduction of 25 per cent. I should like to know whether the Treasury has a new estimate regarding what the receipts would have been during this calendar year if there had been no reduction of 25 per cent—whether they would equal or exceed the previous estimates of income on the business of the calendar year 1923.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have that estimate for the revenue on the business of the calendar year 1923, collected in 1924. If the Senator will remember, the estimated surplus of revenue during that period was $395,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator does not have in mind the same point which I am inquiring about. The estimated surplus on all of the receipts was $329,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But, referring to the estimated receipts from individual income taxes, based upon the business of 1923, my question is whether the later disclosures indicate that the revenue from that source would have equaled or exceeded the previous estimate.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the figures here for 1923. I have them for 1924 in detail. I can state the amount to be collected for 1924, the calendar year. The Senator is speaking of the calendar year, not the fiscal year?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The calendar year.

Mr. SMOOT. For the calendar year 1923 the estimated revenues up to date show a reduction from the collections under the present law of only $505,620,000. In other words, there is a gain of approximately $100,000,000 in all of the revenues as estimated on the 23d day of May, 1924, as compared with the estimates given us when we first had the estimates before us.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then it does indicate that if we should not make this reduction of 25 per cent the revenues from the individual income taxes would exceed the previous Treasury estimates.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Has the Senator in mind the amount of that increase?

Mr. SMOOT. No. One set of figures is based on the calendar year and the other on the fiscal year, and I can only give an estimate, but when I show the figures of the estimated revenues for the fiscal year 1925 the Senator can get some idea of the difference; but it is over $200,000,000.

Take the estimated revenue for the fiscal year 1925. I think this will show the Senator about what he desires. That will be the first fiscal year with the new law in full operation, beginning on July 1, 1924, and ending June 30, 1925.

This is what it shows: The total ordinary receipts under the present law would be $3,798,000,000. Under the revenue act of 1924 the total would be $3,437,000,000. In other words, there is a difference of $361,000,000.

Now I will give a statement of the expenditures chargeable against ordinary receipts, and I am speaking of the Budget estimates of December 3, 1923. I do not give any other estimates than those of December 3, 1923, so that there can be no misunderstanding. Of course, that does not include additional expenditures authorized or to be authorized since that date by Congress, but the total under the present law, according to the estimate, is $3,298,100,000. Taking into consideration the only estimates made by the Budget and taking it for granted that the appropriations of Congress do not exceed those estimates, it would give a surplus up to the time this bill becomes a law of $138,900,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. My recollection is that the estimated expenditures called ordinary expenditures included $511,000,000 for the retirement of the public debt. That was supposed to arise from the sinking fund and also the amount of the bonds which might be deposited in the Treasury by the English Government, and also some bonds from estates in payment of estate taxes and of the franchise tax. It is quite evident now that Great Britain will not pay her indebtedness to this Government in bonds, because the bonds are now selling above par. Of course, those bonds will not be paid to us in extinguishment, to that extent, of the public debt. If that debt is paid in cash, as it will be, there is that amount, something like $165,000,000, which might be considered as ordinary receipts and applicable to ordinary expenditures, not including the retirement of the public debt.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is wrong there. Under the law such receipts could not go for ordinary expenditures, because under the law payments on foreign obligations must go to the retirement of the obligations of this Government.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, for most of the past six months Liberty bonds have not been selling for over par, and at the present time, or until a day or two ago, the 3½'s of the first issue were below par. The next installment to be paid by Great Britain is due on the 1st of June, and throughout most of the past six months she has undoubtedly been preparing to make her payment. Whatever Liberty bonds she has of the 3½ per cent issue certainly could not be resold by her on the market for par, or anything like it. So that, I think, it is reasonable to expect that a very considerable part of her payment on the first of the coming month will be made in bonds, and what will happen during the succeeding half a year no man can foretell.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course that may happen; but if the Senator will pardon me, the 3½ per cent bonds are selling at only about one thirty-second of a per cent below par.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is true at this moment, but they have been very much below that, and, of course, Great Britain does not buy all her bonds on the last day of the six months' period.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is quite true. The difference, however, is very inconsiderable, and prospects are that even the 3½ per cent bonds will sell above par in a reasonably short time.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Suppose they do; the Senator does not for a moment think that Great Britain could sell $160,000,000 of them without breaking the market below par?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course, I can guess at that perhaps as well as anyone else, but $160,000,000 out of an issue of that size is not very much.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is 10 per cent of the issue.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It amounts to almost 10 per cent of the issue, but not quite. The probabilities are that that payment will be made in cash sometime during the year, and to that extent would make available the cash to be used for ordinary purposes.

I am very sorry, if I may express myself again upon the subject, that the Senator from Utah and the Senate did not accept an amendment to the bill which would provide that the indebtedness from Great Britain, if paid in bonds, should be credited against the sinking fund, not leaving at the whim or caprice or business interest of a foreign power the making of a reduction in our indebtedness or not as business conditions might make advisable. I think the amendment should have been accepted by the Senate, so that we would know the exact amount by which our funded debt would be reduced.

I think it is not wise business policy to have the reduction of our permanent debt depend upon the action of a foreign government. I believe that we have been reducing our funded debt entirely too much. A reduction in the funded debt of $511,000,000 in one year is decidedly too much. If we are going to reduce our gross indebtedness, it seems to me that the reduction should come with respect to the floating indebtedness, which is a burden upon the banks of the country and the business interests of the country, whereas the bonds have been absorbed by the public and the Treasury does not need to worry about them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if I understand the statement made by the Senator from Utah, it means that if the bill should fail and the taxes for the next year were to be collected under the present law, there would be a surplus in the Treasury of $499,900,000—within $100,000 of $500,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. But if the bill becomes a law and the taxes are collected under it, there will be a surplus in the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year 1925 of $138,900,000?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is only in case we do not appropriate the amounts estimated by the Budget.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am leaving out subsequent appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. Leaving out all appropriations other than those estimated by the Budget, there would be $138,900,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is not very intelligible to the jury, because the jury does not know how much we have spent in the meantime.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me to proceed, I will give the amounts that are liable to be appropriated over the Budget estimates.

Mr. SIMMONS. The estimated surplus under the present law would be based upon the conditions existing at the time.

The estimate under the present law is that if it remains in force another year there will be a surplus of $500,000,000. If, however, the present law shall be superseded by this measure there will be a surplus of $138,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is based upon the Budget estimates. If there is any appropriation outside of the Budget estimates it would take that much off of the $138,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would take off that much of the surplus under the present law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator can give the information, I would like to have him make his computation not only taking into consideration the appropriations subsequent to the estimates of the Budget, but also the other authorizations, such as the bonus, so that we may know where and how we stand.

Mr. SIMMONS. The $138,000,000 would pay the bonus. There will be plenty of money to pay the bonus.

Mr. SMOOT. It is fair to state, and I think I should state at this time, that those figures are based upon the estimate of $200,000,000 to be collected from income and profits taxes for previous years. It may run over $200,000,000 or it may run less.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, the statement is made, in this estimate, as I understand it, that the surplus of $138,000,000 should be added to whatever taxes are collected by the department in excess of $200,000,000, beyond the income and profits taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. SIMMONS. There are some who think that instead of $200,000,000 we will get $300,000,000. Of course that is purely a conjecture.

Mr. SMOOT. I asked Mr. McCoy if he thought there would be any more than $200,000,000 collected, and he said no; he did not think there would be. He told me that this morning and gave his reasons, and they appealed to me as very good reasons.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator advise us how much was collected from that source last year?

Mr. SMOOT. There was some $400,000,000 approximately collected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Can the Senator advise us how many of those claims have not been settled up to this time?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a very small percentage, I will say to the Senator, not over 2 per cent of the whole amount of claims.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator know what percentage was collected in the last year?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but it was larger than any other year. Of course, as every year passes those old claims of 1917—and there is where most of them sprang from—are weeded out and the larger ones settled. The actuary told me this morning that he does not anticipate a dollar's worth more than the $200,000,000.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator if he could not supply figures showing what percentage of the unsettled claims were collected last year and the year before, and the amount remaining yet to be settled, so that the Senate might have a reasonable basis for a calculation as to the actual amount to come in this year, because, if the character of the claims is the same as last year and the per cent yet to be settled is as great as those settled last year, or approximately that, we could get some intelligent idea as to how much would come from that source this year.

Mr. SMOOT. The percentage could not possibly be the same, because we collected a great percentage of them last year. I think the larger amounts were collected last year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had been under the impression that in the discussion of them this year, especially in connection with the board of tax appeals, the opinion was expressed that there was a very large number of claims yet to be acted upon.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember it was put in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH. Could not Mr. McCoy, who is in the Chamber now, tell us about how much is yet to be collected?

Mr. SMOOT. What Mr. McCoy said was that he does not believe there will be over $200,000,000 collected. We name $200,000,000 in our estimates.

Mr. SIMMONS. The estimates are based on the assumption that that much will be collected.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and if it falls short of $200,000,000 we are short in our estimates that much. If it runs over, we are over whatever it may be.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] wanted to know really what the estimate of the surplus meant. It means that this is based upon the expenditures chargeable against ordinary receipts under the Budget estimate of December 31, 1923, not including additional expenditures authorized or to be authorized since that date. This estimate does not include the following items.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, what I want to get at it this: Of course, I know that the bonus bill does not require much money now. It only requires the cash payment, as it was stated.

Mr. SMOOT. But the fiscal year we are figuring on—1925—will require $135,000,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to know, with the ordinary appropriations for the Government and the authorization under the bonus bill, whether the tax bill is not sufficient to cover those items?

Mr. SMOOT. It would if we simply had the bonus bill. There would be $2,000,000 over the balance, if our estimates are correct, to pay the bonus for this year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator if, when he reported the bill to the Senate, he did not estimate that there would be $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 deficit?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. We anticipated that there would be a deficit, and I so stated, and that is why I am stating now the difference in the estimates.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am gratified to find that there will be no such situation.

Mr. SMOOT. So am I.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator did not include when he estimated a deficit of $70,000,000 the payment of any bonus at all.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. Eliminating the bonus, we would have $138,000,000 surplus instead of $50,000,000 deficit.

Mr. SMOOT. If the conference had agreed to the bill as it passed the Senate, we would have been in the fix I stated we would be in when the bill was before the Senate, but the conference has made changes greatly increasing the revenue.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was speaking about estimates made by the Senator when he reported the bill and before we acted on it at all. He estimated then there would be a deficit of something like $70,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I used the same estimate that I am using now, and I have been trying to explain that those estimates by Mr. McCoy have changed, because some of them were made over a year ago, and the estimates I have given to the Senate to-day were made to include up to day before yesterday. That is where the difference arises.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me, the Senator from North Carolina, as I understand it, claims that under the estimate made when the bill came into the Senate and before it was modified by the Senate, there would be a deficit of something like $70,000,000 under the bill as it came from the Finance Committee. It was modified and certain taxes were reduced, and it went back to conference, and in conference it has not yet been restored to the high point, perhaps, where it was when it came from the Finance Committee at first, and yet with those modifications as now in the bill it will meet the bonus and will give a small surplus besides.

Mr. SMOOT. It will do that, provided we do not have certain legislation, including the reclassification bill, calling for $15,000,000, which we will have to have, and we can not get away from it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator's estimate when the bill was before the Finance Committee included those things.

Mr. SMOOT. No. At the time we thought we were going to pay the $240 bonus to the field employees. Nobody thought we could get the reclassification——

Mr. SIMMONS. But we did not include any estimate for the bonus when the Senator reported the bill out, because there was no bonus legislation at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly not. That is true.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. As I understand the matter, with the anticipated income from the new bill and from other funds which are expected, there will be money in hand to pay off the expenses of the Government and to pay the bonus.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; provided we do not enact the following legislation, which is now in the hands of Congress:

The reclassification bill, carrying $15,000,000. The Veterans' Bureau bill, carrying $32,000,000. That has been passed, and it ought to have been passed. That is for the disabled veterans and is a recodification of all the laws affecting the Veterans' Bureau. We passed it, and I have not any doubt that it will become a law. Then there is the bill providing hospitals for the World War veterans that carries $6,800,000. We have already passed the District of Columbia surplus fund bill, which carries $4,500,000. That has already passed both Houses. We have already passed private bills carrying over $2,000,000. The Post Office employees' compensation bill is the unfinished business to-day, and the very least estimate of cost of that bill is $65,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. If Mr. McCoy's estimate overruns $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 in excess of the $200,000,000, we would still have money enough to pay the additional items.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. The additional items will amount to $125,000,000, and no farmer legislation included.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the bill as the Senator reported it from the Finance Committee had passed the Senate without any change whatsoever, those items to which he has now referred would further have increased the deficit that he then estimated would be the result of the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it, and I have stated it on the floor several times in calling attention to those very items. I called attention then to the bonus bill, which had not at that time passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator read the other items?

Mr. SMOOT. The other items of legislation to which I referred include the public buildings bill, which we ought to pass. I have now a demand from the departments here for space for nearly 3,000 employees, and I do not know where to secure it. I am investigating every public building and having a survey made to see if there is not some way of getting part of them under cover.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to invite the attention of the Senator from Utah, when he is trying to house all these thousands of new employees, not to the District of Columbia, but to the great territory of the United States. We have too many people here now.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. We passed a law to try to regulate rents so as to hold down the cost of living, and the local courts nullified it and Congress is helpless. It would not do any good to increase salaries, because that is only an invitation to the landlords to increase rents and to other people to increase the prices on their products.

Mr. SMOOT. And they do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course they do. The revelations made here by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, are simply astounding, and yet almost everybody knew in a general way that something of the kind existed. If we are going to give up the right, as it seems to me we have, even for the preservation of the Government itself, to regulate the cost of living in the District of Columbia, why not take a lot of these employees and bureaus and commissions and put them somewhere outside of the District of Columbia? They do not have to be in the District of Columbia. Without any doubt we could take 25,000 employees out of the District of Columbia and put them somewhere else where they could live economically and where the cost to the Government would be less. There is no reason why the public lands, for instance, should be administered 1,000 or 1,500 miles away from the lands themselves. There is no reason why a whole lot of these commissions should be in Washington. We ought to do like the States do—put them somewhere in the different parts of the country. Many of them could be centrally located and expenses saved.

It seems to me we have about reached the time when we ought to declare our independence from the grip of what it seems to me we are officially informed by a committee of this body is holding us down. We should get away from courts that will nullify the laws we pass to regulate the cost of living in the District of Columbia. It seems, if we undertake to regulate rents here, that we would be met with injunctions, and probably would somewhere else, but let us give some other courts an opportunity to try their whips on us instead of having it all done in the Capital City.

Mr. SMOOT. The last report I have received as to the number of employees in the District of Columbia shows that on April 1 of this year there were 64,680 employees in the District of Columbia.

Mr. NORRIS. We could take half of them out of the District without any damage to the public service.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that is a question for future legislation. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that I do not know where to turn to get space for the 3,000 employees we will have to have to put the bonus bill in operation.

There is on the Senate Calendar at this time a bill calling for $10,000,000 this year for buildings for the Government in the District of Columbia and $10,000,000 next year. I think there ought to be a program to stop the everlasting payment of $2 per square foot for rentals in the District of Columbia. Let them try to rent to somebody else. They will find nobody who would pay that high rent.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator. Why not have the bonus bill enforced from some other central location in the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is out of the question. If the Senator would go and see the trainloads of records that would have to be moved—and I do not mean to say a carload, but I mean trainloads of records—he would understand the difficulty of that proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. I know; but we should only have to move them once.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be; but the same records must be referred to by other departments than where located.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be all; and they could be moved in a freight train.

Mr. SMOOT. But they would all have to come here in the end.

Mr. NORRIS. None of them would have to come here. There is not any reason why the Pension Bureau should be in the city of Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. There may be something in that; I do not know; but they are here; and so long as we have employees and make appropriations for them we have got to house them. If we can not erect buildings here, as we can erect them by paying interest at the rate of 4 per cent, then we are compelled to rent buildings in the District of Columbia and to pay outrageous rentals.

I will now proceed with these items. For instance, next year it is understood that we have got to have a naval program which will cost $100,000,000. Senators, I am simply suggesting these items; I do not say that all of these bills will be passed, but I wish you now to know that they are not included in any estimates that have been made. The estimates that we have given are based exactly on the situation as it is to-day. The estimates do not include any of these other items of which I have spoken. We shall be compelled, however, to provide for the following items:

Reclassification will cost $15,000,000; the Veterans' Bureau $32,000,000; hospitals for the World War veterans $6,500,000; District of Columbia surplus fund $4,200,000; private bills which we have already passed $2,000,000. As to the post-office employees, of course I do not know whether or not the bill providing for the increase of their compensation is going to pass and become a law, but at the very least, should the bill pass, it will require an expenditure of $65,000,000.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if I may ask a question with reference to the bill providing for the postal employees, are there no provisions made in the bill as to any reclassification of postal rates so as to take care of any part of the additional expense?

Mr. SMOOT. There are no such provisions in the bill. It is a straight increase of compensation measure at the very time when we are putting into effect a reclassification of other Government employees. I recognize, too, that if the reclassification bill goes into effect there will be changes, for every employee in the field service will have a perfect right to appeal to the board if he is not satisfied, although the reclassification has been made according to the returns made by the employees themselves to the Classification Board.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am not now a member of the Post Office Committee and have not examined the bill, but I was under the impression that certain changes had been made in the classification of certain mail matter looking to meeting this additional expense in the Post Office Department.

Mr. SMOOT. Nothing whatever of that kind is provided in the bill; in fact, the Senator knows from his own correspondence that there is a bitter protest from all over the country, particularly from the farmers of the country, against the increase in the parcel-post rates. I have had such letters by the hundred.

Mr. SMITH. I was under the impression that there was quite an extensive field where there might be fair and equitable adjustments and reclassifications in order to bring in greater revenue, and I thought perhaps that that matter had been investigated by the committee and had been provided for in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not a member of the Post Office Committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, what the Senator from Utah has been saying, if he will pardon me, with reference to the postal employees' bill and the large increase in the expenses of the Government by reason of legislation which may hereafter be enacted, would apply with equal force if we had adopted the Mellon plan.

Mr. SMOOT. It would have applied just the same.

Mr. SIMMONS. Or if we had adopted the bill as it passed the Senate. In fact, Mr. McCoy's estimate shows that if we had adopted the Mellon plan just as Mr. Mellon wrote it and sent it to the committee we would have had a surplus at the end of 1925 of $160,000,000 as against an estimated surplus of $138,000,000 under the bill now under discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. There would be a difference of only $22,000,000. What the Senator from Utah has been saying means that if we had passed the bill in accordance with the Mellon plan or had passed the House bill or the pending bill the additional legislation which he is anticipating or fearing—I do not know which—would increase the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from South Carolina is right as to that. The President of the United States, in his message to Congress recommending a reduction of taxes, based his request solely upon the recommendation made by him that economies be practiced on the part of Congress.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I have about concluded, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I merely wish to call attention to a further fact. During the last calendar year we reduced the gross debt of the United States by $1,078,000,000. I think we may very well consider that we have something of a surplus brought over from last year if only a reasonable reduction of the public debt be taken into consideration. That reduction came about in this way: Through the sinking fund and through payment of the English debt there was brought about a reduction of only between $400,000,000 and $500,000,000; but a surplus was brought into the Treasury of over a half billion dollars more, which was paid out in the liquidation of ordinary expenses of the Government instead of reissuing the short-term certificates; so we actually have a carry over of over a half billion dollars after retiring over a half billion dollars of the public debt. I think that in our legislation we can well afford to take cognizance of that situation and not feel that we are running on the ragged edge of things.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I will conclude in a few moments.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me say one word to the Senator from New Mexico, if the Senator from Utah will permit me. Of that billion dollars we paid last year upon the public debt about $284,000,000 came from the sinking fund.

Mr. SMOOT. That is quite right.

Mr. SIMMONS. And about $160,000,000 represented the amount received from foreign governments. That was all the money which under the law the Secretary was required to apply to the payment of our indebtedness, was it not?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. SIMMONS. Notwithstanding that amount being something over $400,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury reduced the public debt to the extent of a billion dollars.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. One billion seventy-eight million dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the correct figures are $1,072,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And, of course, the Secretary did the wise thing, when he had the money in the Treasury, instead of issuing interest-bearing certificates, to use it in taking up certificates already issued. I am not complaining of what the Secretary of the Treasury did in that respect.

Mr. SIMMONS. Neither am I.

Mr. JONES of the New Mexico. But I call attention to the fact that if we had only liquidated our public indebtedness by half a billion dollars last year we would have over a half billion dollars surplus in the Treasury now.

Mr. SMOOT. I gave the exact figures as to what made up the payment of $1,072,000,000 on the public debt when I made my speech upon the bill. The sinking fund was included in that amount, as stated by the Senator from New Mexico, and the payments on the English debt were also included. Then there was $437,000,000 carried in the banks of the country on deposit, and the Secretary decided to reduce the deposits and take up an equal amount of short-term certificates. The remainder of it, of course, represents the gain in the revenue of the Government over and above expenditures.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator a question right there. There was a surplus of three hundred and some million dollars in the Treasury at the end of the last fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. I can state the exact amount by referring to my previous speech.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator if the Secretary did not apply that surplus to the payment of the indebtedness of the Government?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator allow me to answer that question?

Mr. SMOOT. There was that surplus, and that is the surplus to which I had reference over and above the amount of expenditures. Then there was the sinking fund; there were the debt payments; and there was the reduction in the cash balance carried in the banks of the country. The remainder of it of course, as I have said, was gain.

Mr. SIMMONS. Surplus.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; surplus.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the surplus for that year was about the same as the surplus now.

Mr. SMOOT. And I think it was approximately the same, perhaps a little bit more.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was very nearly the same, and the Secretary applied that surplus to our indebtedness.

Mr. SMOOT. He took up short-term certificates.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the same thing.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Utah is correct in saying that there was a large balance in the Treasury at the beginning of the last calendar year. There were around $500,000,000 in the Treasury at that time, and of course that could have been used even before that time in taking up short-term certificates; but it was carried over into the following calendar year, and the net reduction, after accounting for the cash balance last year, was $859,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; including the sinking fund, which, of course, we have got to provide anyway, and including the payments on the English debt, which we have to use for the liquidation of the obligations of the Government.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. What further payment is contemplated? How much is likely to be paid during the next year for the reduction of the public debt?

Mr. SMOOT. We have got to provide at least $284,000,000 in the sinking fund under the law. That is to take care of $10,000,000,000 of the bonds which we issued during the war, and the other $10,000,000,000 which we issued are to be taken care of by the payment of foreign obligations and are to be retired from such payments.

Mr. COPELAND. What is the estimate of that amount?

Mr. SMOOT. The only payments that we receive now on foreign obligations are from England, and they will amount on the average to about $170,000,000 a year. Of course, a small sum will be received from Finland, amounting I should say to about $35,000 a year, and from Hungary a sum less than that. Those are the only foreign countries that are paying us anything at all at this time.

Mr. COPELAND. Are there other sums?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, there would if we could make settlements with other nations. France, for instance, owes us over $4,000,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. I mean outside of the international debts.

Mr. SMOOT. No, not outside of the international debts.

Mr. COPELAND. Are there other sums that are likely to come in that could be used?

Mr. SMOOT. No, not that I know of.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. My recollection is that the estimated reduction of the public debt for the year is $511,000,000 plus.

Mr. COPELAND. For what year?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. For the fiscal year 1925.

Mr. SMOOT. The only estimate that I now recall showed a probable reduction of $395,000,000. However, that does not make any difference, for the reports show the facts.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I want to say to the Senator that he certainly is incorrect if he states that there was no estimate made. If the Senator has before him the estimate which has been made for the fiscal year 1925, I am quite certain he will find the estimate that the public debt would be reduced out of ordinary receipts by $511,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of talking now about what we may be able to do. I know if we make the appropriations to which I have referred we will be faced with a deficit.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one further question. Only a certain amount of that reduction is mandatory, is it not? That is to say, for instance, the collections from foreign governments must be so applied.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. But, even beyond the mandatory payments, it is contemplated that there will be further payments from the ordinary receipts of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not under the estimate that we have for 1925 and in view of the reductions in the tax bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Where do the figures given by the Senator from New Mexico come from?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. They come from the sinking fund which is required to be set aside——

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and from the payments on the English indebtedness.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. They include the payments on the debt of Great Britain, the estate taxes which may be paid in bonds, the franchise tax upon the Federal Reserve Board which is invested in these bonds, and so on, making from those sources $511,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we are estimating from the estate tax a revenue of $110,000,000. That is counted in the amount of receipts, and if it is paid in bonds, we can not pay our obligations by bonds, but have to issue short-time certificates to cover that amount. We shall have to have the $110,000,000 in order to make up the amount of receipts that we estimate for in this bill.

Of course, Mr. President, we are going to have the amount of the sinking fund. We shall have to do it, and we shall have to put in the sinking fund what England pays us each year to take care of the retirement of an additional $10,000,000,000 that we did not provide for in the original act.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I assume that in the estimates of expenditures included in the calculation of the Senator from Utah, as given to the Senate a little while ago, the sinking fund for the purpose of paying off our domestic debt is included, and that it includes also the amount that we are expecting to receive from foreign governments.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly; that is what I say.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is included in the estimate the Senator has given.

Mr. SMOOT. We must do it under the law. We can not do otherwise; but, taking everything else into consideration and providing for those two items, we will have under the estimates made a surplus of $138,900,000, providing we appropriate only what the Budget estimated for; and, of course, I am not going to repeat the items by which Congress has gone beyond that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think we all understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. Just as far as Congress appropriates over and above the estimated surplus of $138,000,000, of course, we will fall short.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought to state this fact: In 1923 and 1924 we had quite a number of estimates as to the condition of the Treasury. We started out with an estimate that there would be a deficit of something near $800,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, those were estimates that were made a year and a half ahead of the time the money was collected.

Mr. SIMMONS. They were made last year, in 1923.

Mr. SMOOT. No; they were the first estimates that were made.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will understand what I mean to say when I finish. Then there was another estimate which presented the possibility or the contingency of a deficit of something like $500,000,000; but the Treasury Department received income largely in excess of the amount thought possible at the time those estimates were made.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not any doubt about it, because the revival of business came on in 1922.

Mr. SIMMONS. When we actually collected the money we saw that all the estimates that were made were far afield——

Mr. SMOOT. But they were made a year and a half ahead.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and that instead of a large deficit there was a very considerable surplus—the surplus of $319,000,000 we are now talking about. The first estimates made by the department after this bill was introduced indicated a much less amount of receipts on the part of the Government than the estimates that the Senator has just submitted to the Senate. The department admits, therefore, that this time, as well as the first time I refer to, it was mistaken, and mistaken because the receipts of the Government under the present law were very much greater than they estimated.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, no man can tell what will be the actual result of operations during the fiscal year 1924–25 under this bill. It may be that as in the former case, instead of having a surplus of $138,000,000, if business is good, as we all hope it will be, we may have a surplus far in excess of that, as we had last year a large surplus instead of a large deficit as was indicated by the previous estimates.

If the Senator will pardon me just a minute longer, when the Senator reported this bill and stated that the indications, so far as the estimates then before the committee were concerned, pointed to a deficit of $70,000,000, I think he said that he would take his chances; and I think he was right in saying that, because the Senator probably anticipated, or at least hoped, as we now anticipate or at least hope, that there will be a great increase in the receipts of the Government, and that the surplus will be much larger than we are now calculating. Of course, there is a possibility of its being less; but, following the trend of the last two years, the indications are and I think we have a right to assume that the probabilities are greatly in favor of an increase in the surplus instead of a decrease in the surplus now estimated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is only fair to say this: Take, for instance, the amount of revenue that came from the importation of goods into the United States. Nobody thought that the revenue would amount to more than $400,000,000. When I stated upon the floor of the Senate that it would be $400,000,000, I was questioned immediately. I thought I had put it at as high a figure as it was possible for me to imagine; but, instead of that, there was nearly $200,000,000 more, an unprecedented amount. Nobody would have thought of such a thing; but we got nearly $200,000,000 more from that one source. These estimates were made at the beginning of 1922, as many estimates are made, a year and a half before the actual collection of the tax; and this is what happened: In 1921 business had just begun to revive; in 1922 it was good, and, of course, the receipts increased; so we have not got that in our favor in the estimates here for the future.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Is not the condition that confronts the Congress at this time the same as the condition that confronts the Congress whenever it seeks to raise revenue, either by the imposition of taxes of this kind or by a tariff, that the estimate as to what will happen is mere speculation?

Mr. SMOOT. We know now a great deal better than we do where an estimate is made a year or 18 months ahead, because we know this: Take, for instance, the rates on importations. They are not quite holding up now to what they were a year ago. We have estimated in this amount $500,000,000 from that source. Business now is off somewhat, as everybody knows; the importations are falling off, and we are not collecting from that source the money that we anticipated; but in the estimate that is made to-day we take that into consideration, because we know what is happening.

Mr. BROUSSARD. What I want to do, if the Senator will permit me, is to show that whenever we are about to pass a bill we must be guided by the latest estimates that we can get.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. BROUSSARD. There is nothing positive about it, however; and with the knowledge and the information that the Senator has at this time based on estimates made yesterday, there is no reason to think that the country will suffer more by virtue of the legislation that has been passed, including the bonus, than on every occasion when we have passed a bill. It has been asserted, and the propaganda has gone out, that we have about wrecked the Treasury by voting the bonus; and I am glad to hear the Senator state now that we are no worse off than we have been whenever we have taken up a measure of this kind to raise revenue. After all, whether we will have a surplus or a deficiency depends on what we are going to do hereafter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I should like to supplement what I said a little while ago with a statement that I have just gotten from the Treasury Department. The estimate made by Mr. Mellon in December of the receipts of the Government was $150,000,000 less than the estimate of receipts now made.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I think the reason of that is that the income-tax returns came in on March 15, and those returns show—there is no question about it—that there is an increase of revenue from that source; and that is why, in a large measure, this additional estimate is made, showing the difference between the original estimate and the one that is made to-day.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. What is the amount of savings made by the new bill over the existing law?

Mr. SMOOT. About $490,000,000.

Mr. COPELAND. The amount of savings is about $490,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will tell the Senator the exact amount. I think it is $499,900,000, if the Senator wants to know exactly.

Mr. COPELAND. There is a reduction of approximately $491,000,000, provision is made for the payment of the bonus, and in all probability a half billion dollars will be paid off on the national debt.

Mr. President, I think the thanks of the Senate are due to the Finance Committee for bringing in a bill which makes possible all this very hopeful prospect. The country is not going to smash. All these gloomy forebodings have been silly. We have given the country relief to the extent of over a half billion dollars in taxes. We are going to take care of the national debt; and we can still say that—

God's in His heaven—
All's right with the world.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will close my statement now with the hope that the conference report will be adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he estimates a deficit in the revenues by reason of the passage of this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that there will be a deficit if we pass the legislation to which I have already referred. I do not want to go over it again.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But, so far as the legislation that has been already enacted is concerned, there will be no deficit, in the Senator's opinion, if this bill is passed as reported?

Mr. SMOOT. The bonus bill has been enacted already, so that will leave about $2,000,000, and of course we have passed the private bills and some of the other bills, the District bills. There will be a little deficit on the bills that we have already passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. We can pay the bonus and there will still be a small surplus.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the bill provides for a flat reduction of 25 per cent on all individual income taxes payable in the present fiscal year?

Mr. SMOOT. For the calendar year 1923.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And also a reduction approximating 25 per cent in the individual income taxes payable in the following years?

Mr. SMOOT. More than that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Averaging more than 25 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator. I am through, however.

Mr. KENDRICK. In the Senator's very concise and, it seems to me, very clear report on the action and work of the conferees, he spoke of the reduction allowed for losses sustained in capital investment.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KENDRICK. At the time the Senator made the reference I did not like to interrupt him, but I should like to have the Senator explain, in a word, what changes were made in the present law in connection with that matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the present law, if a capital loss is sustained, suppose it is a $100,000 loss, then in the return made by the taxpayer, if he has a gain of $100,000, that capital loss can offset that gain. The Senator remembers that in the existing law capital gains are limited for taxing purposes to 12½ per cent, or, in other words, a man may make $100,000 in capital gains and he is only charged a tax on 12½ per cent on the $100,000, or $12,500; but in the existing law he is allowed the full amount of his capital loss, so the bill as reported to the Senate by the conferees treats the capital loss exactly like the capital gain, and if he loses $100,000, he can only take 12½ per cent of that loss and deduct it from his gain. If he makes $100,000, he pays taxes upon 12½ per cent of the $100,000. I will say to the Senator that it made a difference in the revenue of about $60,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I want to put in the RECORD a statement regarding the public debt, so that it may be in the RECORD in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in order that there shall be no question about it.

I have before me the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, which is the latest report of the Treasury on the subject. For that fiscal year the public-debt retirements chargeable against ordinary receipts are listed as follows:

Sinking fund	$297,144,300
Purchases from foreign repayments	37,854,500
Received from foreign governments under debt settlements	160,969,325
Received for estate taxes	10,000,000
Purchases from franchise-tax receipts (Federal reserve banks)	6,000,000
Making a total of	511,968,125

For the fiscal year 1925 the figures are as follows:

Sinking fund	$310,000,000
Received from foreign governments under debt settlements	160,277,975
Received for estate taxes	6,000,000
Purchases from franchise-tax receipts (Federal reserve banks)	6,000,000
Making a total of	482,277,975

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if he does not think the estimate just prepared by the Actuary of the Treasury, from which he has been reading, should be put in in connection with the statement of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I intended to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, but it can be put in at this place.

Mr. SIMMONS. It comes better at this place.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from New Mexico will permit me, I offer these figures as an appendix to his last statement as to the results for the year 1925 under the Mellon plan, under the present law, and under the measure we are now considering.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD the matter referred to by the Senator?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Estimated revenue, fiscal year 1925

(Revenue act of 1924 as agreed to in conference.)

Source	Mellon plan	Present law	Revenue act of 1924
Customs	$500,000,000	$500,000,000	$500,000,000
Internal revenue:
Individual income and corporation tax	1,662,000,000	1,900,000,000	1,650,000,000
Miscellaneous taxes	824,000,000	925,000,000	814,000,000
Total internal-revenue taxes	2,486,000,000	2,825,000,000	2,464,000,000
Miscellaneous receipts	473,000,000	473,000,000	473,000,000
Total ordinary receipts	3,459,000,000	3,798,000,000	3,437,000,000
Expenditures chargeable against ordinary receipts (Budget estimate of Dec. 3, 1923, not including additional expenditures authorized or to be authorized since that date)	3,298,100,000	3,298,100,000	3,298,100,000
Excess of ordinary receipts over total expenditures chargeable against ordinary receipts	160,900,000	499,900,000	138,900,000

To this surplus should be added whatever taxes are collected by the department in excess of $200,000,000 on account of income and profits taxes for previous years.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in rising to oppose the conference report, I realize that I am undertaking a futile thing, and I want at the same time to make my position perfectly clear, and give the reasons for my position.

The Democrats and the Republicans have gotten together now, to a very great extent, on this conference report, and of course it is only a question of time before it will become the law, unless vetoed by the President. I want to be fair, in stating my position, with those who are going to vote for the conference report. There are a great many things in the bill as the conference committee have agreed upon it which I favor. There are a great many respects, at least some respects, in which the conference committee bill is better than the bill as it passed the House, in my opinion, and likewise better than the bill as it passed the Senate. I say, in some respects. In some other respects the bill agreed upon by the conferees is considerably worse than the bill as it passed the House, as I look at it.

When we are considering a conference report, we must consider the parliamentary situation in order to be perfectly understood. In the particular instance now before us, the two great outstanding features of the conference report which I oppose are, first, the rejection of an amendment which the Senate attached to the bill, offered by the Senator from New Mexico, in which a graduated tax was provided for the incomes of corporations. The other, as I view it, is the so-called publicity amendment, applying to income-tax returns.

I realize, too, that we can not expect a conference committee to get everything they want or that we want. An agreement in conference is necessarily somewhat of a compromise always. But I do not believe that the conferees on the part of the Senate have done their full duty, notwithstanding this. The publicity amendment should have been carried back to the House and the Members of the House given an opportunity to discuss it and to vote upon it by roll call. I urged that that be done, and that the conferees insist that it be done. There would have been no difficulty, if our conferees had insisted upon it, in bringing that condition about, and putting the House on record, as the Senate is on record, on that particular amendment. That has not been done. It is good politics not to do it, and in my opinion that is the reason it was not done.

The Democrats expect to elect the next President. Whether their hope will become a reality or not will depend upon the man whom they nominate. If they nominate one of the two Senators who are now giving me their attention, their dreams will probably be realized.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator want to start a feud between these two Senators? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. But assuming the Democrats do elect a President, not knowing who the nominee is going to be, and therefore who the President is going to be, Democratic politicians do not know whether their boss in the White House is going to be in favor of publicity of income-tax returns or opposed to it. Yet I think the country believes, from the vote taken in the Senate, that the Democratic Party is in favor of publicity of income-tax returns.

If that be earnest, if that be genuine, why should we not put on record the Members of the coordinate branch of the National Legislature, and see whether those who voted for publicity of income-tax returns in the Senate would be vindicated by a vote of the House?

I believe just as firmly as that I am here that if the House of Representatives had had an opportunity to debate the publicity amendment which we put into the bill on the floor of the Senate, and had had a roll-call vote, the amendment would be in the bill now, and because I believe in the amendment, and because our conferees have not insisted that that step be taken, I am opposing this conference report.

In my judgment, if we could send it back and a vote should be had in the House, the bill would come back before us in a second conference report with the approval by the House of the Senate amendment on this subject, and likewise with the approval by the House of the Senate amendment on the corporation-tax proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I note that the Senator is making the same protest which he and others have made every time there has been an important bill before a conference committee. We have observed that in the final analysis the legislation of this body is passed in secret, behind closed doors, by a group of Senators and Representatives. I am fully in accord with his suggestion that there should be a requirement that amendments which are debated in the Senate and voted upon on this floor should be submitted to the other body, and amendments debated and voted upon in the other body should be submitted to the Senate, and not to a committee of conferees to pass upon them in secret. We are in accord in that view.

I believe it will lead ultimately to a widespread protest from the American people against this method of constructing important legislation. I do not know of anything that does more damage and causes more disrespect for our institutions than the failure to have a vote in both our Chambers upon an important amendment. The idea of a conference committee being able in secret, behind closed doors, to suppress almost the unanimous vote of this body is intolerable. It is not representative government. It is secret, star-chamber government.

I trust the Senator will pardon me for digressing a little from the question I desired to ask him, but I rose to ask the Senator in what way we can force action that will lead to having some of these amendments passed upon by the other branch.

Mr. NORRIS. In only one way, and that is by rejecting the conference report.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That might result in the defeat of the bill itself.

Mr. NORRIS. I think not. If we were to adjourn tomorrow or the next day, or had a time fixed for adjournment within the next few days, there would be something to that theory; but I do not think it would defeat the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am sure the Senator feels as I do, that we would not care if every single amendment were taken out of this bill, if we knew that was the consensus of opinion in the other branch; but when we have doubt as to whether they would agree or disagree, and when we have only the judgment of a small handful of Representatives in the Congress, I think our protest is justified.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his observation. If the bill had gone back to the House, and the House had had a roll-call vote on this particular amendment of which I am speaking, and on the other one offered by the Senator from New Mexico, and those amendments had been defeated by decisive votes, I would have made no further protest. I realize that we can not always have our own way, no matter how earnestly we may believe we are right. It is a matter of compromise. But, Mr. President, as the Senator from Massachusetts has so well said, in the case of amendments of the importance of these two, which were debated fully in the Senate and put on the bill on the floor of the Senate and then referred to the conference, it is not right that they should be rejected by the conferees without the House ever having an opportunity to debate them or to vote on them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is not representative government.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope I will be understood when I say that I am not finding fault with any Senator or any Member of the House or any outsider who opposes either one or both of these important amendments, but the Senate showed by a very decisive vote, after a full and unlimited debate on both of them, where the Senate stood, and our will has been nullified by three or four men meeting in secret. That is the effect of the conference report.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And without any record to show who those men were or how they voted.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a record to show who the men were, but no record of how they voted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is a record of those who were in the conference, but there is no record of how they stood upon this measure.

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is not. The way it stands now, one branch of the National Legislature or its Members, if this thing ever comes up again in a subsequent Congress, will be able to jump either way without ever having been put on record. The men who represent constituencies in either branch of our National Legislature, where the thing should come properly before them, ought to be on record on a roll-call vote as to whether they favor or do not favor such important propositions.

I want to repeat, with all respect to the conferees and to the Members of the House of Representatives, that if there had been a roll-call vote on these amendments, I would not be here to protest against the conference report, because, as I said, there are a good many good things in it that I favor, and if I were voting for or against the bill as they have reported it here and were called upon to vote for or against it without reference to any opportunity to improve it, I would vote for it. But I am opposing the conference report because I believe that if it would go back to conference and would be taken back to the House, and the House of Representatives had an opportunity upon a roll call to vote on the amendments, they would improve the bill and make it better than it is. That is the reason why I am opposing it, because that is the only way under the parliamentary situation that that can be brought about. If our Democratic friends in the House of Representatives are as near unanimous in favor of publicity and the other amendments as they were in the Senate, I want to say to you, my Democratic friends, there are enough Republican votes in the House to put both of those amendments across. Why do you not take it to them and give them an opportunity to vote?

Mr. President, it seems to me that no argument of a logical or sound nature has been made against the publicity of income-tax returns. Men with millionaire incomes do not want it, and it seems, therefore, we can not get it. In my opinion, if we had publicity of income-tax returns we would greatly increase our revenue. Knowing that the income-tax returns are behind closed doors and locked and sealed from the eye of the public, the dishonest man, in making an income-tax return, feels that he runs no risk to do everything in that return to cut down his income, because it is going to be kept forever in secret. The inclination, then, to any individual who is not completely honest is to make his income as small as possible for the purpose of that return.

As I said, the publicity of income-tax returns would bring much additional revenue into the Treasury of the United States. No man can tell how much. I think any reasonable individual, however, who will remember that there are millions of them, and that the opportunities to defraud the Government out of proper tax are almost unlimited as long as the returns are in secret, must agree that the amount would be enormous. It would run into hundreds of millions of dollars, in my judgment.

But that is not all. The honest man now who makes an honest return and pays honestly the tax that should come from him in the way of an income tax is discriminated against and compelled to pay a higher proportion of tax than he should pay.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Some idea of the losses to which the Senator refers can be determined by a knowledge of the fact that in one year the reassessments by the Government after examining the returns of taxpayers were $600,000,000. In other words, there were errors amounting to $600,000,000 traceable and determinable by an examination of the taxpayers' reports.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Has it not been the policy to transact all public business publicly? Is it not the policy of every republic to do that?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Under what theory do we deny any public scrutiny of the transactions of collecting taxes, refunding taxes, and all those settlements? What honest man could object to the people knowing what was done with the tax returns?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not answer the question of the Senator, because I can not conceive of a theory based on logic or an objection based on reason in opposition to the publicity of income-tax returns.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why would it not be just as reasonable to say we will close the doors of the courthouses and have all litigation in private so that the public may not pry into a man's business? Why not say it is not wise for the public to know?

Mr. NORRIS. I should think it would be just as reasonable and the same principle is involved.

Mr. CARAWAY. And when they do not have publicity there is always more or less corruption.

Mr. NORRIS. Always. The history of civilization shows that corruption and dishonorable conduct in public office always comes from secret government, and secret government can not be conceived if we claim that we are living in the highest state of civilization.

Mr. CARAWAY. The contention of many men has been that the Great War, just ended, was the result of secret diplomacy.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and with a great deal of reason contended that if we had not had any such thing as secret dealings between governments we would not have had, perhaps, the Great War. At least there were many wars that we would have avoided if we had been dealing publicly with our neighbors in an international way.

Mr. President, who would consent for a moment that the Senate and House of Representatives should transact all their business in secret? Who would consent for a moment in any county, in any State of the Union, that the returns of the assessor should be locked up and nobody given an opportunity to examine those returns? Millions and millions of people are making tax returns to the local assessors all over the United States, millions more than are making income-tax returns, and as far as I know every single one of those returns is a public document and subject to examination at all reasonable hours by the public generally, and yet when we come to the income-tax returns the doors are locked and nobody allowed to make any examination of any return on file. It must be apparent that the Government of the United States is losing hundreds of millions of dollars every year on account of this silly notion. It is said that a man does not want his neighbor to know about his business. He can go to the courthouse and find out by looking over his tax returns now if he wants to do so. He can go to the courthouse again when there is a lawsuit and find out away beyond the secrets of a financial proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And when he dies there is a public record of his estate.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; when he dies he always leaves his property behind him. There has never been an exception to that rule that I know of. His property is administered and the public find out all about it.

They know about his business; they know how much he had; they know what kind of property he had, and what property brought him in an income and what did not. They know all about it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So that his heirs are not protected by any secrecy.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Whatever amount he leaves to his wife and children is known to everybody.

Mr. NORRIS. From the top to the bottom of a democratic form of government there is no place for secret public business. Let us admit, although I am not able to conceive of an instance where anybody would be hurt by publicity, that in one case in a thousand or a million some one might be injured. Must benefit that will accrue to all the people be surrendered in order to protect one or two in some business whim?

I have heard it said—it was in a statement made by no less a man than Secretary Hoover, as published in the newspapers—that if we had publicity of income-tax returns some people would pad their returns, and represent their incomes as being greater than they were, in order to make their neighbors believe they were rich. I would give a premium for that if anyone should care to do it. If anyone is anxious to have other people think that his income is great and is willing to pay to the Federal Government something extra in order to have that notoriety in the neighborhood, bid him Godspeed and let him put his money on the table. What a calamity it would be if Mr. Mellon or Henry Ford should pay the Government more than they ought to pay it! What a terrible thing! How it would shock the people, and how it would hurt the taxpayers! Just think of it!

Mr. President, there is another respect—though I want to be frank and to say that in that respect the conference report has somewhat modified the existing law and has made it better—there is another respect in which benefit would come, and that is in connection with framing legislation. We have passed through both Houses of Congress, after very extended hearings in committee and lengthy debate on the floor, a revenue bill, the conference report on which is now before us. We knew that in the existing tax law there were loopholes; we knew that we were not getting the money we ought to get from income-tax returns; we knew that in thousands of ways the real spirit of the law was being violated; but we did not know how. From those who were called upon to legislate was concealed behind locked doors and vaults the evidence that would disclose the loopholes by which dishonest men avoid paying taxes to the Government. And yet the opponents of publicity clamor and say, "You must not let anybody look at those sacred documents." If a man has made an honest return, how can he be hurt by publicity; if he has made an honest mistake, how can his feelings be injured even then, if that mistake is corrected and made right—whichever way it may be?

Under the bill now before us, committees of Congress can examine tax returns, but that will not give them the opportunity to bring about remedial legislation such as they would have if the amendment which the Senate put on the bill had been included in the conference report and made a part of the law.

It is true that members of the Finance Committee of the Senate and of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives are to be permitted to examine tax returns; but they are not the only pebbles on the legislative beach. There are some others here who are equally interested in good legislation, who are equally interested in having the right kind of a revenue law; but they are all denied access to these secret records of big incomes. From a legislative point of view alone such records ought to be public. We get much of our information even on important legislation from men outside of Congress who are particularly well informed on various matters of legislation, but if they wanted to assist in good legislation of this kind they would still be denied under this bill access to tax returns.

Mr. President, there is a third important reason why these returns ought to be published, at which I have before hinted. The honest citizen who makes an honest return is entitled to protection in preference to the dishonest one. We are proposing to legislate here to the advantage of dishonest people and thereby adding to the burdens of the honest men who want to pay what they rightfully ought to pay. This bill does not give the honest man a square deal; it gives the advantage to the dishonest taxpayer and puts additional burdens upon the man who wants to do his full duty; because if one set of taxpayers do not pay what they ought to pay, the burden is correspondingly increased upon those who do pay what they ought to pay. We could reduce the rates if everybody in the United States paid what under the law he ought honestly to pay.

Heretofore there has not been any way to remedy, in public at least, anything that was found wrong in tax returns. A man may overpay; that often happens. The honest taxpayer may have paid too much; he may have paid more than he is required under the law to pay by having made some mistake. So long as the returns are secret he will never find it out. That is unfair to him. He ought to have an opportunity, if a mistake is discovered in one man's return and his is similar to it, to know of the mistake that was discovered, in order that he may apply the information to his own return, and if something was due to be refunded that he could get it back honestly, squarely, openly, and aboveboard.

Mr. President, there is another loophole in the existing law which we sought to correct here by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], which our conferees have likewise given up and surrendered without asking the House to vote on it. It looks to me as if we had left a loophole in this law big enough to drive a four-horse team right through it. Corporations will pay a flat tax of 14 per cent. Upon small corporations that is too much. It may be compared to the normal tax on the individual, which commences at 4 per cent, but as the income increases and falls in the higher brackets surtaxes are added, which bring about larger levies on the big incomes. But the corporation tax does not commence low enough to give relief to the small corporation with small capital.

The amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], instead of fixing the normal tax on corporations at 14 per cent, fixed it at 9 per cent—in my opinion, it should have been still lower—and then it was increased, according to the income, to a point as high as the tax on individual incomes.

Why should not that be done? If a corporation has an income so large that, if distributed, the individuals receiving it would be compelled to pay the rate provided for in the very highest brackets up to 40 per cent, why should we permit that income to be retained in the corporation and permit the corporation to pay a tax of only 14 per cent? Yet that is what this bill provides.

We heard in the debate on this bill of many instances where men having very large incomes incorporated for the express purpose of avoiding taxation. If their incomes should fall in the brackets that are higher than 14 per cent, they could afford to do it under this bill and make money by the operation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know the Senator wishes to be absolutely accurate.

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill does not provide for a corporation tax of 14 per cent, but of 12½ per cent plus the tax on capital stock.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is about the same, except that the 14 per cent tax, it is estimated, would yield about $20,000,000 more revenue than the present law, indicating that a 14 per cent rate would be higher than that now contained in the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to state in this connection that the 14 per cent tax which was suggested by the Finance Committee was fixed in contemplation that there should be no capital-stock tax. So, likewise, in framing the amendment which I presented to the Senate the rates were fixed in contemplation of the same situation, that there should be no capital-stock tax. I expressly stated that if the capital-stock tax should be retained, in that case the normal tax upon corporations would be reduced from 9 per cent to 8 per cent, and still raise the same amount of revenue.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think that the rejection of this provision that we incorporated in the bill in the Senate is going to enable men with large incomes to pay a tax of 12½ per cent only. They will combine in corporations. Five or six men with individual incomes, let us say, even on Liberty bonds, running up to $200,000 or $300,000 apiece may put them in a corporation and pay a tax of 12½ per cent whereas the individual with practically the same income will have to pay as high as 46 per cent, when the normal tax with the surtax is included. I want to ask the Senator from New Mexico if I have overstated that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not believe the Senator has overstated it at all, and I do not believe he can give too much emphasis to that thought.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to say to my Democratic friends that the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico was in the nature of restoring the old excess-profits tax by which corporations paid a rate somewhat in proportion to their income. It was better than the old excess-profits tax. You will remember that that tax was repealed when the present law was passed; and all over the West in every campaign that has been made since, that is one of the things that was hurled into the teeth of Republican candidates, that they had voted to repeal the excess-profits tax. Now the Democrats, even of the Senate, are going to relieve their Democratic brethren in the House from going on record on the restoration of that tax that they condemned the Republicans for repealing. If you will examine the roll call when that tax was repealed, you will find that the proposition was not entirely a partisan one, although the Republicans had control of the Senate.

Do those proclamations of the Democrats, then, made throughout the Middle West at least, mean anything? Were they made for the purpose of getting into office, to be violated after, on that kind of a promise, you did get into office? Is it one thing to condemn the repeal of a law when you are trying to get in, and another thing to take the same action yourselves after you get in? Are you afraid to send this bill with that provision to the House of Representatives and let the Democrats there go on record?

You did not talk that way in the campaign; and again I want to assure you that if you were telling the truth in the campaign, and if you mean your professions now, if you will send this bill over there we will furnish you enough votes from the other side to put that amendment into the law.

Mr. President, as I said at the beginning, I think I know the situation in the Senate well enough to know that this conference report can not be defeated. I know it will be charged that I, and such men as I, who believe in these two particular amendments that I have advocated, have voted against this bill. I tried to make it plain at the beginning that my object in opposing this conference report is not because I am opposed to the bill, but because I am anxious to make it better before we finally pass it, and because the only way to accomplish that under the present parliamentary situation is to defeat the conference report.

I want to say frankly that it seems to me this conference bill, with the exception of the big loophole I have mentioned, is a very good bill. I am only asking that we take such action here as will make it better. I like, for instance, the rejection of the Senate amendment on inheritance taxes, and the retention of the estate tax, mainly because the House rate went up a good deal higher than the Senate rate did. I think a great deal of that provision. I admit, too, that there are some publicity features here that will do some good, though not very much. My opposition to the conference report, therefore, is based entirely upon the proposition that if we could reject it and send the bill back to conference we would have incorporated in it when it got back here in the next report both of these amendments if the House voted on them both.

If the House rejected one upon voting on it, I should be willing to quit on that. If the House rejected them both, then I should be willing to accept the bill as it is now. I want to say to the Senator, however, and particularly to the conferees, that it seems to me that on these two very important propositions they have not done their full duty. The House has had no opportunity to debate or vote on either one of them; and when I ask that that opportunity be given, and that they insist that it shall be given, I am not making an unreasonable request.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I share with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a very deep disappointment that this revenue bill is not what I think it should be. I feel that some explanation is due to the Senator from Nebraska, to the Senate, and to the country, as to why this report is now presented to the Senate bearing the signature of every member of the conference committee.

The two principal features discussed by the Senator from Nebraska, as he has stated, are the two important controversial features of the bill. It is necessary to recall the history of this legislation.

About a year ago the Secretary of the Treasury announced to the country that there could be a substantial reduction of Federal taxation. When the Congress assembled at the closing of last year the President of the United States came before the Congress in joint session and referred to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, with the assistance of the experts of his office, had prepared a revenue bill which would bring about a reduction of taxation, and the President thoroughly and completely accepted the measure as proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Almost in exact language he adopted and indorsed the Mellon plan.

The House took up the bill for consideration. It made very substantial changes in the Mellon plan, especially so far as the individual income taxes were concerned. It increased quite materially the taxes upon estates. It provided in considerable measure for information as to the contents of tax returns.

The bill came over to the Senate, and I felt as deeply as does the Senator from Nebraska that the one great means for the evasion of taxes had not been dealt with at all. The House had made no change with respect to the taxes upon corporations. The Senate did adopt, by a very substantial majority, a different plan for taxing corporations. I believe for the first time since I have been a Member of the Senate there was not a Democratic vote against the proposed plan for taxation upon corporations.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator refers now to the action in the Senate?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that the Democratic vote over in the House would be the same, does not the Senator realize that if they could have gotten a vote on the matter there would have been enough progressive Republicans in the House to put it in the law?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have not the slightest doubt that that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I should like to ask the Senator why he, as one of the conferees, and in addition because he is the author of the amendment itself, did not insist that the House conferees take that amendment to the House and have a vote on it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I expected to answer that just a little later, but I think I might as well do it now.

So far as the Senate conferees are concerned, they expressed a desire that the amendment should be taken to the House for a separate vote and that the question of the publicity of individual tax returns should likewise go to the House for a separate vote. We were met with a united opposition to those proposals, and that opposition was based not altogether upon opposition to the provisions in the Senate bill but was based largely upon the fact, and I may say that was the controlling influence, that the conferees on the part of the House desired above all things else that a revenue bill should be enacted into law at this session of Congress. There were a large number of Members of the House who were of the definite opinion that if either one of these measures should be incorporated in the bill, the bill would not become law because of the intervention of the Executive veto. The bill as reported by the conferees does provide, so far as individuals are concerned, a large measure of tax reduction.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator have any assurance that the bill in its present form will receive the Executive sanction? I saw by the morning papers that Mr. Mellon is likely to veto the thing in any form.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, of course I do not know whether or not this bill in its present form will receive the signature of the President.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am interested in the Senator's statement that the conferees surrendered these valuable amendments because they were afraid of a veto. If these conferees who are afraid of a veto from the White House had been told that the President would veto the bill in any other form except in the form in which Mr. Mellon wanted it, would the conferees have lain down and agreed to it in that form? In other words, would the conferees be willing that the Executive should be supreme, and that we should simply be a lot of pawns, to be pushed about at the will of the Executive, and at his pleasure?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, of course, I do not believe we should merely register the will of somebody else in our legislation; but in regard to this matter, the conferees on the part of the House were firmly convinced that the legislation would receive the Executive veto if these two amendments were left in it, and that, I am sure, furnished, at least to some extent, the reason for the very positive position that they took, that these amendments should not go back to the House for a separate vote.

Mr. NORRIS. May I again interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. They were not willing to take them back to the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, and I would like to ask the Senator a question—and if it is at all embarrassing I will not insist on an answer. I want to ask the Senator whether one of the reasons why this was not insisted on was the fact that at least some people in control of some politics in this country did not want to put the Democrats of the House on record on either one of these propositions? Was there not something of that kind?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I can not answer that question, because it was not presented to me as a reason for the action of the conferees. It is just possible, and the Senator may have gotten definite information, that that did actuate some people, but that was not the basis for the action of the conferees on the part of the House as presented to the conference committee.

I regret that it was necessary, in my judgment, for the conferees on the part of the Senate to indorse this conference report, but I became thoroughly convinced that it was the best that could be done under all the circumstances. I became convinced that we would be most fortunate if this bill, in its present form, should meet with Executive approval. I am still in doubt as to whether or not it will meet with such approval, but my belief is, subject to such doubt, that it will become law.

I read in the morning paper that the Secretary of the Treasury was very much opposed to this bill. I have no doubt that it fails in many respects to meet the unqualified approval of the President, but my judgment is, although it is not free from all doubt, that when the President takes the bill up for consideration, and when the responsibility is put upon him either to accept it or reject it, I believe that the President will sign it and that it will become law.

If that should be done, there will be a large measure of relief from taxation. If it is done, there will be an opportunity for the Congress of the United States at least to inquire into the methods adopted by taxpayers to evade just taxation. The provision in the bill bringing into the light all controversies which may come before the board of tax appeals, as I understand it, will have a very beneficial result. I do not believe it is right to have a controversy between the Government and a taxpayer regarding moneys due from him to the Government, moneys due to the taxpayer by way of abatement and refund, adjusted and settled in secret. It is repulsive to me, and I feel some degree of gratification that that will not be done any longer, at least as to matters which come before the board of tax appeals; that in the important matters the testimony will be taken down, it will be transcribed, and that testimony and all exhibits will be subject to public scrutiny. I think it is a great step in the right direction.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I not only voted for the publicity feature, but the Senator from Nebraska will recall that I spoke for it. I would like to ask the Senator from New Mexico if the conferees succeeded in adding some features to this publicity provision as it came from the House? In other words, is the publicity feature in the bill as finally agreed upon an improvement on the House provision?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There is no question about that. The bill as it passed the House contained no provision regarding the publicity of proceedings in the Treasury Department in the adjustment of claims between the Government and the taxpayers.

The bill as it came from the House did contain the provision that committees of the Senate and the House, and joint committees, should have access to these returns. To that provision there was added, in the Senate and in conference, this further feature, that, whereas under existing law the names and addresses of taxpayers in the several collection districts are published by posting a notice in the post office at the county seat of each county in the district, under this provision the amount of the taxes paid by the taxpayer is also posted. But, of course, it gives no information as to the sources from which the incomes are derived.

Mr. COPELAND. But the Senate conferees did succeed in improving the House provision, at least to the extent named?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. We improved it to that extent. To my mind that was a very substantial improvement.

The report of the committee leaves the present law in effect so far as the tax on corporations is concerned. To my mind the present law upon that subject not only furnishes a means for the evasion of taxes which should be paid to the Government but it discriminates against the taxpayers of the country. It works a gross injustice.

The difference between the individual income rates as proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and those finally written into this measure, is based largely upon the fact that the Mellon plan was written and devised for the benefit of the favored few and against the interests of the great body of taxpayers of this country. The same may be said of the provision of the present law, which the Secretary of the Treasury insists shall remain as it is, in regard to the tax upon corporations, as to those citizens who are engaged in business through corporate organizations.

We have heard time and again of the number of individuals who would be benefited more by the Mellon plan than by the Simmons plan—the few, about 2,500 only—and it was for the benefit of those 2,500 that the Secretary of the Treasury, with the indorsement and the approval of the President, sought to put over on the country his plan for individual surtaxes. I say that in almost the same degree, if not to a greater degree, does that principle apply to taxation upon corporations.

I need only call attention to this situation: According to the statistics of the incomes, based upon the last year for which there has been any compilation, I find this remarkable condition of affairs: Three hundred and fifty-six thousand three hundred and ninety-seven corporations made income-tax returns for that period; 185,158 of them had no taxable net income. As to that 185,000 the present system imposes a direct tax upon capital, and not income at all. These corporations returned that they had a deficit in income of $3,878,219,134; but notwithstanding a deficit, under the present law they will have to pay a capital-stock tax which can only be paid out of capital. They will have to borrow the money with which to pay it. That, to my mind, is wrong. I favored the repeal of the capital-stock tax and to raise the whole revenue from the tax upon net income. The Senate favored that, but the conferees on the part of the House insisted that the present law providing for a tax upon corporations should remain just as it is. The Senate changed that provision so as to raise the revenue from a tax upon the net taxable income rather than the capital-stock tax. Under the conference report the capital-stock tax will be restored, and these 185,000 corporations, which had no net income but a loss, will have to dig up the money somehow to pay that tax which brings into the Treasury about $85,000,000 a year.

Of the other corporations there were 75,451 reported a net income of less than $2,000, and 135,987 reported an income of less than $10,000, leaving 35,252 corporations out of more than 356,000 with incomes above $10,000 a year. Of the 35,252 there were 25,327 which had incomes of less than $50,000 a year. That leaves of all those corporations only 9,925 that had incomes above $50,000 a year, and they are to pay a capital-stock tax; they are also to pay a flat tax of 12½ per cent, and that 12½ per cent is as much tax as an individual would have to pay if he had an income of over $50,000 a year. So all those corporations, except 9,925, will have to pay more tax or the same rate of tax as an individual with an income of $50,000 a year, and a capital-stock tax in addition.

If an individual were operating as a corporation he would have to earn through the corporation as much as $50,000 a year and more in order not to pay taxes at the same rate as the individual doing business in his individual name. We know, moreover, that those corporations generally have more than one substantial stockholder. If they have two equal shareholders owning the corporation, then it would be necessary for the corporation to have an annual income of $100,000 in order that the rate of tax upon the corporation should not exceed the same rate of tax upon the income if earned by a partnership with two partners. Of those corporations having an income of a hundred thousand dollars a year and more there are only 5,330. So those 5,330 corporations are to be protected under the existing law, the law supported by the Secretary of the Treasury, and even of those 5,330 many of them, as we know, are owned by the general public. The stock of the dividend-paying railroads of the country is scattered all over the country. They have thousands of stockholders. The same is true of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., with over 100,000 shareholders, and other large corporations of that kind, where it is to the absolute disadvantage of the shareholders that the corporation should pay the flat tax rate of 12½ per cent, which only takes the place of the normal tax of 6 per cent or less when the dividends are paid to the shareholders.

So I think we can eliminate at least one-half of those corporations. There will then remain of those corporations probably not more than 2,500 who are receiving the express favor of legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Perhaps in my absence the Senator commented on it, but I do not think we can emphasize too often and too strongly the fact that every class and group of corporations and individuals in America have had war taxes reduced except one. The nonexcess-profit-making corporation is paying to-day 25 per cent more tax than it paid even with all the war-burden taxes upon it. I do not think we can emphasize too strongly the fact that this clearly shows that the Republican Party supports big business and not small business.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Masachusetts was not only right in his observation, but I think it is important for us to make it clear just how that came about. The war was just being ended; in fact, we were still paying a large share of the direct expenses of the war when the revenue act of 1921 was passed. It was realized that there should be a reduction from the war taxes, and the process adopted, so far as corporations are concerned, was by repealing the excess-profits tax; but it was realized that to do that and nothing else would not bring in sufficient revenue for the Treasury. During the war the flat, or normal, tax upon corporations was 10 per cent. That was the war tax—10 per cent upon all corporations. In order to repeal the excess-profits tax and still raise the money, they not only did not reduce the war normal tax of 10 per cent, which was imposed upon all corporations, but they increased it to 12½ per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And they retain it in the present bill, which is a bill to reduce taxes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes, that is retained. It is in the present law framed by the same responsible political party. It is the same provision which the Secretary of the Treasury and the President advocated when they presented the Mellon plan, which proposed to leave it in the law, and it is the same provision that is reported now in the bill by the conferees of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The very business corporations that need most a reduction in taxes, that need most to be encouraged because of their limited profits, are to-day bearing a heavier tax than during the middle of the war.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is quite right. That flat tax has been increased to 12½ per cent, being 25 per cent higher than in the very midst of the war, and no suggestion ever was made for relief to those corporations, which, as I have said, numbered all told 356,397, less the very few thousand which I pointed out and which are making large incomes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will ask the Senator if among the class of corporations that had their tax increased 25 per cent since the war are not only small, struggling merchants and manufacturing concerns but all of the public-service corporations practically and the railroad corporations which have been adding to the taxes of the people by increasing their revenues through increased car fare.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not think there can be any defense for the tax of 12½ per cent upon the railroads of the country—the public utilities of the country—where their rates of fare are regulated by law and where these taxes must be distributed among the users of the service of transportation companies and public utilities generally. It is absolutely indefensible, and it can only be justified upon the theory which the Secretary of the Treasury has repeatedly announced, that they want to favor the few, give them exemption from taxation, so that they may prosper, so that they may control business productivity in the country.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In a word it amounts to this, does it not, that the big corporations with their enormous income, because they control the markets of the country and the world, have had their taxes reduced since the war by a substantial amount, while competitive business men have had their taxes increased?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is quite right. I deem it unnecessary to dwell upon this phase of the case longer.

It was repeatedly discussed when we had the bill under consideration.

I desire, however, to call to the attention of the Senate an article discussing the present law upon taxation of corporations which was published in the Annalist under date of May 12 of this year. The Annalist is a journal of economics published by the New York Times, a paper which, as we all know, has favored to a very great degree the so-called Mellon plan. But in this publication there appears an article which is quite illuminating and furnishes very interesting reading to anyone who is a student of the subject. I ask that the entire article may be printed as an appendix to my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[The article referred to will be found in the appendix to the speech of Mr. JONES of New Mexico.]

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The article is written by Mr. George B. Robinson, who is president of the Wall Street security house bearing his name. As I have stated, it is published under date of May 12, 1924, in the Annalist, which is a weekly publication by the New York Times Co. The title of the article is "Corporate finance perverted by the income tax." At the beginning of the article the author refers to a bulletin of the National City Bank of New York, of December, 1922, in which that bulletin used the following language:

> There is no good reason why persons desiring to conduct any business, whether large or small, under the corporate form of ownership, should be placed by policies of the Government under any burden or disadvantage as compared with individual proprietors or partnerships. They are entitled to like consideration and similar treatment.

The author of this article, after having made that quotation, begins as follows:

> The obvious corollary to this well-taken point is that there is also no good reason why persons desiring to conduct any business under the corporate form of ownership should be placed by policies of Government under any advantage or special privilege as compared with individual proprietors or partnerships.

Mr. Robinson, after a preliminary statement, points out nine different features of business policy which are invaded by the present tax upon corporations. I will read those in this connection. The article states:

> Our present law tends to encourage, if it shall not force, the following changes in our financial structures:
> 1. The incorporation of all large successful industries and activities.

The individual or the partnership must pay a tax upon all the earnings of the business, whether taken out of the business or not. The corporation can retain it all by the payment of 12½ per cent.

> 2. The incorporation of all personal businesses which earn considerably more than their proprietors' needs for living expenses.

That is a point which we have discussed on the floor of the Senate on various occasions; that corporations are organized for the express purpose of transferring properties to the corporation, keeping the earnings in the corporation, paying the 12½ per cent only, and taking out as dividends only a sufficient amount to pay the living expenses of the stockholders.

> 3. The incorporation of all large real estate holdings where State laws permit.
> 4. Vast vertical corporation expansion, such as the purchase of railroads or coal mines by Ford Motor Co.
> 5. Further centralization of control of business through placing the individual's expansion at a disadvantage compared with corporate advantage.
> 6. The dissolution of many small corporations.

I do not see how anyone can look over the statistics and not conclude that the law will unquestionably force the dissolution of thousands of corporations, even where the shareholders would prefer to do business as a corporation.

> 7. Cash dividend policies dictated by the willingness of large (usually dominating) stockholders to receive taxable cash.
> 8. Growth of the practice of "taking profits" through the medium of making "capital gains" to the extent that dividends are most generous when controlling stockholders have stock for sale.
> 9. More stock dividends to facilitate distribution of stocks at such times until a corporation confessing to a share parity of $100 will be a novelty.

This article discusses those various points and, in my judgment, anyone interested in the subject will be glad to read it.

Mr. President, the writer proposes a remedy, and the remedy he proposes is that the earnings of the corporation shall be ascertained and that the shareholders shall pay the tax upon the shares that they hold. I submit that that would be ideal if it could be done.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator suggested that in the committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In 1917 in the Committee on Finance the very first suggestion I made to the committee at that time was that that plan be adopted, but on investigation it was ascertained, first, that it would be unconstitutional, and, second, that it would be impracticable with regard to the vast number of corporations whose shares of stock are dealt in daily on the exchanges of the country. The plan proposed by the writer of the article, as I have said, is ideal, but unfortunately these other barriers must prevail.

Then what remedy should be adopted? I submit the remedy which the Senate adopted when this revenue bill passed the Senate. There is nothing radical about it; there is nothing drastic about it. Any corporation can carry on business in a reasonable way, and, even so far as the corporation is concerned, pay less taxes than it pays under the present law.

The Actuary of the Treasury has been kind enough to prepare some tables showing the operation of such a provision. A corporation with a capital of $100,000 and a net income of $10,000, under the proposal as it passed the Senate, would pay a tax of $900, instead of a capital-stock tax, and a flat tax of $1,250 on its earnings. Of course, it was understood that if the capital-stock tax should be retained the flat tax of 9 per cent as proposed would be reduced to 8 per cent. If so, taking the law as it is now and the proposal which the Senate adopted, such a corporation would pay in taxes under the provision adopted by the Senate $800 and the capital-stock tax, as against $1,250 and the capital-stock tax under existing law. I may add that any corporation earning as much as $25,000 would need to pay only the flat tax of 8 per cent and the capital-stock tax. I may add further that in regard to the small corporation of $10,000 it is not estimated that there would be any distribution of its net income or any additional tax coming from shareholders through the surtax provision.

Take the corporation with a net income of $100,000. Such a corporation can retain under the provisions of the bill as it passed the Senate 50 per cent of its net income and pay less taxes than under existing law. There is an exemption of $10,000 for every corporation, and, applying that exemption, together with the rates of surtaxes paid upon the undistributed annual income, it could retain over half of its net earnings and pay less taxes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the Senator any figures showing the percentage of corporations making returns of taxable income that would benefit by his amendment as compared to the present law?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will say to the Senator that I presented that rather at length during his temporary absence from the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator and will be glad to review it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have referred to the tax which the corporation would pay, but we can not lose sight of the fact that if corporation incomes are distributed the shareholders will add the cash dividends to their other income and pay surtaxes upon them; so that a corporation with $100,000 net income, if distributing 51 per cent of its earnings, would pay only a flat rate of 13.51 per cent—that is, counting the 9 per cent, but if that be reduced to 8 per cent, as proposed, the rate of tax would be 12.51 per cent—and upon a retention of 51 per cent of its annual income it would pay substantially the same rate as the flat tax imposed upon all corporations. However, there would be paid surtaxes by the individual shareholders, so that it is estimated that on the whole income from the corporation and the shareholders the Treasury would receive revenue at the rate of 17.51 per cent.

Of course the loss of revenue by relieving these small corporations from high taxes must be made up somewhere, and so the plan is to make it up by imposing surtaxes upon distributed dividends and bring about a situation where the dividends in some cases will be distributed to a much greater extent than they are being distributed under existing law.

I likewise have a computation of a corporation of $5,000,000 capital and a net income of $1,000,000 a year, showing just how it would operate; and another computation of a corporation with $1,000,000 of ordinary net income and a surtax income of another $100,000.

It must not be overlooked that under existing law—and it is a part of the Mellon plan—a corporation can own any of the Federal bonds absolutely free from all taxation. The Secretary of the Treasury has inveighed against the use of tax-exempt securities for the purpose of evading taxation. Let him begin with something with which he can deal and rectify the evil within his own control or within the control of the Congress. He has made no suggestion that the Federal bonds owned by corporations should pay any tax, although the bonds themselves are subject to surtax. If an individual owns these bonds, he is exempt only from the normal tax. If the corporation owns the bonds, it is likewise exempt from the normal tax, and that tax is the only tax which the corporation pays; and therefore all these bonds held by corporations are wholly exempt from taxation.

I do not know whether the Secretary of the Treasury is interested in any financial institutions handling these bonds or not, but I do know that there is a large floating indebtedness of the Government which is held almost entirely by these corporations. They can take these securities, bearing 4½ per cent interest, and hold them absolutely free from all taxation.

Mr. President, to my mind this is a crime. It seems to me that when once understood by the taxpayers of this country, they will realize the outrage which is imposed upon them, and imposed upon them deliberately, because they know the conditions, and is imposed deliberately for the purpose of favoring the approximately 2,500 corporations which are using this process to evade just taxation.

I ask leave that these tables may be inserted at the conclusion of my remarks as an appendix.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[See appendix.]

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, the corporations that would be likely to carry these bonds that are exempt from taxation when in the hands of corporations are again the very prosperous corporations, with large surpluses, and which least need discriminatory legislation in their favor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Unquestionably; the Senator is right about that.

In regard to the proposed tax on corporations, if adopted by the Senate——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Before the Senator closes, as I do not want to interrupt his argument—I have been called from the Chamber and have not had a chance to follow his argument in full—I should like to have him, if he has not already done so, refer to three attacks that have been made upon this amendment. As I understand them, they are these:

First, that the Senator's amendment seeks to tax all surpluses of corporations already set aside. Of course, that is absolutely false; it is not true; but the Senator is aware of that criticism or misrepresentation?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad the Senator has suggested that, and I hope the newspapers of the country will do us at least the justice of making mention of the fact that it has no reference whatever to accumulated surpluses of corporations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have had letter after letter requesting information from me as to whether they ought now to scatter the surplus that they have already accumulated, so as to avoid this; and, of course, the Senator's amendment did not have anything to do with already accumulated surpluses.

The second attack I have heard made upon the Senator's amendment is that it tends to discourage sound and good business dealings; that we ought to encourage the accumulation of surpluses by corporations, and that the imposition of the Senator's tax upon surpluses would tend to discourage the doing of business in the soundest and safest and surest way.

The third attack I have heard made—and then I will let the Senator answer—is that it would prevent corporations from setting aside surpluses to expand their business; that mills would not use their surpluses for the erection of new buildings, and business houses would not accumulate surpluses for the expansion of their business.

In that connection may I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that if a business man who is not incorporated makes a large amount of money and wants to erect a building in which he can establish his plant or his store his accumulated income is taxed; and is there any difference between a corporation being taxed for its accumulated income and an individual being taxed for the same purpose?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it is my information that there are many large businesses in this country conducted either by an individual in his own name or by a partnership. Those industries want to expand just as much as an industry which is doing business under a corporate form. If they want to keep their net income in the business it is taxed, and it is taxed at the same rate as if the entire amount were distributed to them and taken completely out of the business.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In other words, the individual pays both the normal tax and the surtax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The individual, of course, would pay his normal tax, and he would pay his surtax up to the maximum of the surtaxes, while the corporation would pay only this flat tax of 12½ per cent. It should be remembered that there is no tax upon the income of a corporation until it has deducted every item of expense, including depreciation and depletion of plant, and what is left is absolutely a net income, an addition to the wealth of the corporation. It is only when that point is reached that any tax is imposed under the bill or the present law. When that point is reached, I want to ask what concern is going to be disrupted or is going to lose its credit when it has distributed in dividends to its stockholders as much as 48 per cent of its net income?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And when that point is reached, why discriminate between the corporation, on the one hand, and the individual or partnership, on the other, to the advantage of the corporation in doing business?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There can be no justification whatever for it. Moreover, there are other means which can be adopted for additions to capital if the corporation seeks to do so. A plan frequently adopted by corporations now is to issue interest-bearing scrip, and if it is taxable to the shareholders as individual income the corporation is relieved from the tax.

Another system which can be adopted, as is often done, is this: The corporation says to its stockholders, "We have so much earnings here, so much net income. We want to put up an additional plant. We want to use this money that we have. It will be to your interest to have us do so"; and in such a case the corporation may say to its shareholders, as thousands and thousands of them do, "We would like to have you take your share of this dividend and invest it in additional stock in this corporation." That is a frequent thing. It is being done right along.

The American Telegraph & Telephone Co. within the last few days has advertised a plan to sell to its stockholders $150,000,000 of stock, and upon that basis they sell them the stock, they get their dividends from the corporation, and get the right to buy the stock with those dividends.

Moreover, as to all these thousands and thousands of corporations where there are a few individuals doing business as a corporation, they are given permission to make returns as a partnership. So, Mr. President, I can not conceive an objection coming from any business man unless he wants to set up not a reason but a mere excuse for using a corporate device to evade his just taxation.

Mr. President, I ask also that there may be printed as a supplement to my remarks the provision of the bill as it passed the Senate and stricken out in conference contained in section 228, which is a provision that shareholders may be taxed as partners; also the substitute plan for the taxation of corporations as found in section 230 of the bill as passed by the Senate but also stricken out by the conference committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

[See appendix.]

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I also ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks the table to which I referred, which is found in the Statistics of Income for 1921, on page 63 of those statistics, and designated as Table D.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPENDIX

[From the Annalist, Monday, May 12, 1924]

CORPORATE FINANCE PERVERTED BY THE INCOME TAX—THE ESCAPE OF IMPOSTS OUTWEIGHS SOUND PRINCIPLES, YET THE LAW BEGINS WITH A WRONG CONCEPT OF INCOME

(By George B. Robinson)

[Mr. Robinson is president of the Wall Street security house bearing his name.]

"There is no good reason why persons desiring to conduct any business whether large or small, under the corporate form of ownership, should be placed by policies of the Government under any burden or disadvantage as compared with individual proprietors or partnerships. They are entitled to like consideration and similar treatment." (Bulletin of National City Bank of New York, December, 1922.)

The obvious corollary to this well-taken point is that there is also no good reason why persons desiring to conduct any business under the corporate form of ownership should be placed by policies of Government under any advantage or special privilege as compared with individual proprietors or partnerships.

Yet the revenue act of 1921 confers privileges upon the corporate form in some cases, only to establish disadvantages—in other cases they are not compensating because they lack concurrent application—to such extent that we have a law which is a Chinese puzzle, the solution of which has become the chief concern of all corporate finance. And not only is the form of organization of any given business being dictated by consideration of obtaining the utmost exemption, but likewise all other such corporate and personal financial matters as dividend policies, expansion, reorganizations of corporate structure, and the methods of "taking profits" are being governed primarily, when not completely, by the nontaxability they may obtain. We have substituted and are now substituting for the normal considerations which formerly determined questions of corporate and personal finance these new and exceedingly abnormal considerations. That this course is unwise, that it even may prove exceedingly harmful to industrial progress at some later date, may not be doubted when it is realized that the present tax law has not yet earned an assurance of permanence, particularly if, as this consideration of the law will attempt to point out, it has elements of financial unsoundness which do not justify its endurance.

In pre-war days there existed very definite financial principles which governed the actions of conservative men in these respects. A business took the form which best suited the interrelationships between its proprietors and its relationships in its trade; that is, to customers and creditors. Of its earnings, if new capital could be used in the business to good advantage, the dividend policy would be conservative. When desirable expansion (for the present) had been completed, it would be generous. There was no burden incidental to receiving a dividend, as there is now in the case of large stockholders. A surplus was cause for pride, nor did it fear attack, and vanish each year into capital account. When stockholders desired to convert corporation profits into personal profits, they could do so either through the medium of cash dividends or by selling their shares at an advance. They are now largely confined to the latter course by its much greater exemption. Our present law tends to encourage, if it shall not force, the following changes in our financial structures:

1. The incorporation of all large successful industries and activities.

2. The incorporation of all personal businesses which earn considerably more than their proprietors' needs for living expenses.

3. The incorporation of all large real-estate holdings where State laws permit.

4. Vast vertical corporation expansion such as the purchase of railroads or coal mines by Ford Motor Co.

5. Further centralization of control of business, through placing the individual's expansion at a disadvantage compared with corporate expansion.

6. The dissolution of many small corporations.

7. Cash-dividend policies dictated by the willingness of large (usually dominating) stockholders to receive taxable cash.

8. Growth of the practice of "taking profits" through the medium of making "capital gains," to the extent that dividends are most generous when controlling stockholders have stock for sale.

9. More stock dividends to facilitate distribution of stocks at such times until a corporation confessing to a share parity of $100 will be a novelty.

What are the provisions of the present law which confer these privileges and establish these burdens on the corporate form of proprietorship? The National City Bank Bulletin (December, 1922) noted only the burdens, particularly that of double taxation. First the corporation is taxed on its earnings, then the stockholder on his dividends. In all cases where dividends paid out equal or approximate the earnings of a corporation, double taxation exists, except as there is partial relief by the fact that dividends are exempt from normal tax. Consider a small business with two equal owners who are compelled to use its entire earnings for their living. To incorporate such a business is to invite an additional tax—the corporation tax. The fact that the corporate form may best meet the circumstances of the business and the personal affairs of the proprietors in all other respects except taxation is at once forced into the background of consideration.

The advantage of the corporate form, however, is a more serious matter. This does not accrue to the same class of corporations, arising only when earnings exceed the cash requirements (or demands) of proprietors, and may be retained in the business, exempted from personal surtax. In such cases the corporation tax is in effect a penalty tax, paid for the privilege of exempting the difference between earnings and dividends from the personal surtaxes of the owners.

When the excess-profits tax was repealed by the revenue act of 1921 it was believed by many of those who had defended it as a desirable agency of taxation that without it profits would be piled up in corporation treasuries instead of distributed to stockholders. The answer to this fear was section 220 of the present law. This section has since become famous, but as yet there has been no evidence that it is not as harmless as it appears threatening. It begins boldly enough: "If any corporation is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders or members through the medium of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed—" Obviously stockholders do so avail themselves of corporate form whenever as individuals their total taxability will be less on account of not paying dividends than if their form of organization were personal ownership or partnership. The law, however, appears to possess a joker. It recites that the penalty of 25 per cent of corporation earnings attaches when in the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the profits of a business remain undistributed "beyond the reasonable needs of the business," a factor which obviously has nothing whatever to do with the original reason for the provision, which was to prevent taxpayers from availing themselves of corporate form to earn profits without distributing them.

To illustrate, consider Ford Motor Co. Relief from excess-profits tax meant millions. It is generally understood that two men own practically all the stock. It is known that earnings have been huge, though no record of earnings or dividends is published. The published balance sheet, however, indicated an increase in surplus from 1922 to 1923 of approximately $124,000,000. However much in addition may have been paid out to stockholders, this item of $124,000,000 represents earnings plowed back into the business. It is fairly presumable that neither of the two principal stockholders requires a dividend from Ford Motor Co. for living expenses, certainly not of any sum comparable to $124,000,000. The stockholders may, if they desire—and to the extent of $124,000,000 in one year apparently do—permit their personal fortunes to accumulate through the medium of the Ford Motor Co. treasury, taxed only at the corporation rate of 12½ per cent and unsubjected to personal surtax except as they may be further assessable under section 220. But that section, instead of setting forth its original purpose and stopping with that, appears to have made the "reasonable needs of the business" the limit for reinvestment of earnings without penalty. Who in these days of vertical expansion can define the reasonable needs of any business except its board of directors? Would any court hold that it was unreasonable for Ford Motor Co., for example, to invest millions in coal lands to insure its source of supply of fuel? Would it be unreasonable for United States Steel Corporation to use its earnings to retire its funded debt? Or for a chain-store system to decide that it should buy instead of rent its locations? Or for any corporation which borrows money to accumulate sufficient cash so that it will never have to borrow? Or for any corporation to buy out its competitor?

There can be no doubt that the latitude permitted the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in enforcing section 220, if not a widespread belief that the section is in most cases unenforceable under the necessity of proving the holding of earnings "beyond reasonable needs," has brought about the incorporation of many hundreds of corporations to replace personal ownerships and activities. Real estate properties are being incorporated by thousands. So are business men, oil magnates, even actors, artists, writers, and doubtless pugilists. The individual's tax then becomes (except as section 220 may be enforced against him) the corporation tax of 12½ per cent of all earnings plus surtax (but no normal tax) on such dividends from the corporation as may be necessary for personal expenses. The remaining earnings accrue in the Treasury. Our law in such cases is not very different in effect from a sales tax in that the law reaches only received (and presumably expended) income, all other income being avoided.

THE NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

Here, then, is an advantage for the corporate form so great that it may be expected in such cases to overcome all other considerations. It can not be desirable that this should occur. There are risks involved in becoming a "limited liability" country for all great business. The situation of the New York Exchange is a case in point. The rules of the exchange require that memberships may not be owned by corporations. The obligations of members are personal to themselves and their partners. The liability of stock-exchange firms to their customers is accordingly unlimited. It is a fiduciary relationship which should be unlimited; undoubtedly the exchange owes much of the large measure of public confidence it possesses to this rule. But if the present advantage of the corporate form shall be continued, even the New York Stock Exchange may reasonably be expected to ultimately yield its sound rule to the necessities of its members in this regard.

As for dividends, if cash dividend policies are being governed by the tax law, what of stock dividends? Why have they recently become so popular? The railroad financiers of the last century probably never thought of them, or if they did dismissed them from mind as a futile instrument. They were never suspected of constituting income until the Supreme Court decided they did not. Can it be that, nevertheless, they do in some way compensate the stockholder in lieu of cash? Is there any justification for the widespread belief that they should be the object of some special tax?

The plain answer is that they do not constitute income in any way, nor should they be taxed, but that they greatly facilitate the taking of profits in the only manner that escapes imposition of the surtax, namely, through the "capital-gains" provision of the tax law. This provision was an innovation of the revenue act of 1921. The theory, or at least the excuse for it, was that the surtax had prevented the "taking of capital gains," thereby discouraging transactions in property. Taxpayers would not sell properties which had advanced greatly in market value because of the high surtaxes they must pay.

The capital gains preferential was the frank and very helpful answer of Congress to the situation of such large potential taxpayers, placing them at once in a favored position, even as against earners of income by their own labor. Under this provision, the owner of property (that is, land, buildings, stocks, or what not) may sell and declare his profit as a "capital gain" (provided it has been owned for two years), to be taxed at 12½ per cent in lieu of normal tax and surtax.

THE FLIGHT OF TAX EXEMPTS

It may be well to digress at this point to consider another important effect of this preferential tax, which is, that it has greatly facilitated the flight of capital into tax-exempt investments. The Secretary of the Treasury has recently reiterated his opinion that it is the high surtax which has occasioned this flight. This can be true, however, only in regard to the investment of saved income. Indeed, the surtax prior to the enactment of the "capital gains" clause acted as a bar to flight. The owner of land, buildings, or stocks who was prevented from selling by the penalty of the surtax at least held his property for its income and paid surtax on that income. The "capital gain" law has permitted the sale of such properties at a maximum tax of 12½ per cent of the profit, thereby releasing large sums of principal for investment in municipals. It would seem that if the Treasury Department had to contend with the flight of only saved income, taking into consideration that only the remainder of income after subjection to surtax can be saved, it need not be greatly alarmed.

The flight of principal, however, facilitated by the capital gains preferential will become a far more serious matter. Moreover, to say that the property sold will continue to produce taxable income to a new owner is to beg the question. The new owner in thousands of instances will be found to be a corporation which either keeps its earnings in its business, or, if it distributes them, does so to a group of stockholders of modest average income who can afford to hold taxable income-paying investments. Thus it would appear that from the standpoint of revenue to the Government the inability to sell properties because of the high surtax involved possessed elements of advantage, and that the announced purpose of the capital-gains provision, to facilitate such sales, while it has produced taxable income for the present, has undoubtedly reduced it tremendously for the future.

In December, 1922, the Secretary of the Treasury in explaining the reduction in the amount of income subject to taxation, called attention to the fact that "capital gains" were not "realized," whereas "capital losses" were invariably taken and offset against income. But "capital gains" did not have preferential treatment until the taxable year 1922, and at the date of the Secretary's statement the returns for that year were not available. Certainly "capital gains" have been taken eagerly enough and in great volume in 1922 and 1923. We have witnessed a great bull market for stocks and real estate. There have been innumerable sales to the public of interests in successful enterprises. It has been a profit-taking period for many men who have held capital assets they have wanted to sell since 1917 and have grasped this first opportunity. It is to be regretted that the Secretary of the Treausry, having called attention in 1922 to the fact that "capital gains" were not realized, should be silent in his recent report as to the extent to which they have been realized since their preferential treatment became operative.

USE OF STOCK DIVIDENDS

In the case of incorporated businesses the stock dividend has been a natural accompaniment of this opportunity. Here is a legitimate instrument of finance which has two proper purposes, and only two: (1) To capitalize surplus, which announces that the accrued earnings represented will be kept permanently in the business; and (2) to reduce the market value of shares to a more merchantable figure. There has been great confusion regarding this instrument both in and out of Congress, the reasons for the confusion, however, being plain enough.

One of the reasons is that a stock dividend reaches exactly the same result as a cash dividend accompanied by subscription to new stock at par in an amount equal to the dividend. The two are identical as to both corporation and stockholder, yet the former is an exempt and the latter a taxable operation. This is because our tax law does not tax the accrual on earning of income within corporation treasuries to the stockholder, but only its distribution.

A taxpayer subscribes to 10,000 shares of stock in a $10,000,000 corporation, paying par value of $100 per share. The corporation earns, we will say, 15 per cent per annum above corporation taxes for two years. It does not pay any dividend the first year but, at the end of the second year, pays a 30 per cent stock dividend. Our subscriber receives new shares of $300,000 par value. He is in exactly the same position as if he had received $300,000 in cash dividends and had subscribed a similar amount for new shares, except that in that case he would have been assessed for normal tax and surtax on an income of $300,000.

He now has 13,000 shares worth $100 per share (at book value), eliminating the factor of speculative profit or loss. Is it difficult to believe, notwithstanding the Supreme Court, that there has been no income in his case? It would be except for two facts: First, that the Supreme Court was determining what the law is and not what it should be; and, second (to repeat), that the law does not tax the earnings or accrual of income to the stockholder, but only its distribution in cash. In the above case there has been no distribution in cash.

A SAMPLE "GET-AWAY"

But to return to the relation between stock dividends and the capital-gains tax; assume that our stockholder sells his 3,000 shares dividend at its book value, or for $300,000 cash. Having held his stock for two years his profit is eligible as a capital gain. The law will consider the cost of the stock to have been $1,000,000 divided by 13,000 shares, or about $77 per share. His profit will be considered to be $100 minus $77 multiplied by 3,000 shares, or $69,000, and his total tax on the transaction at 12½ per cent will be $8,633. He will then have $300,000 cash, minus his tax, and will continue to hold intact his original 10,000 shares possessing their original book value of $1,000,000 (though they must now be carried on his books at about $770,000).

What possible justification can there be for the constantly reiterated contention that the high surtax discourages investment in productive industry when the get-away under the present law is so exceedingly simple and so modestly taxed?

It should be said that the same result could be accomplished without a stock dividend, assuming a market at which three-thirteenths of his investment could be sold at its book value. But the stock dividend is an invaluable device in creating such a market. Stock dividends continue to stimulate the imagination of investors, and no effort has ever been made by financiers to discourage the widespread belief that after all they do constitute income of a sort. They do at least serve to call attention to any prosperity which a company may have enjoyed, though it may not have been recent.

CASH OR STOCK DIVIDENDS

In either event, the combination of the capital gains tax with the privilege of permitting earnings to accrue within corporation treasuries, assisted by the provision of the law governing reorganizations under which stockholders may receive stock for stock without taxation, enables proprietors to obtain their fortunes in cash without exposure to surtax at any point.

One well-known corporation now pays its dividends in cash or stock at the election of each stockholder. This policy recognizes the fact that the taxable circumstances of its stockholders vary, that some require cash for living expenses, while others are glad to reinvest. To declare cash dividends accompanied by the privilege of subscription (the company is growing and apparently can use new capital to advantage) would be to tax not only the stockholder who requires cash and will not subscribe but also those who do not want cash and will subscribe. The device of giving stockholders their choice makes everybody happy, but only the needed income has been taxed.

That a situation which calls for correction exists can not be doubted, but most of the remedies suggested are quite as unsound as the present law. Some would reenact an excess profits tax, which was always an unfair law in that it penalized the stockholder of small means equally with the stockholder of large means and the small corporation more severely than the large. Other suggestions include a tax on undistributed surplus or undistributed earnings, or on the declaration of stock dividends. To do any of these would be only further to substitute abnormal for normal considerations. Some industries ought to carry their profits to surplus, should be encouraged to do so. The stock dividend is a legitimate and desirable instrument of finance.

It would appear inevitable, though it may be long delayed, if it shall be the desire of the country to enact a permanent tax law based on the principle of the graduated surtax and equally on a resolve to restore sound methods and principles of finance to the industrial life, that the corporation tax must be repealed and the normal tax and surtax coincidentally extended to include the distributive or accrued shares of stockholders in the same manner that partners and owners are now taxed. It would appear that such a revision indeed not only would vastly simplify the law and make it equitable but would, at a single stroke, remove both privilege and burden from the corporate form, restore the individual's opportunities to a basis fairly competitive with those of corporations, estop all the interference with corporation policies of long-proved value, and finally permit reduction in the surtax rates and such preferential treatment for earned incomes as might seem desirable.

The Bulletin of the National City Bank above referred to called for abolition of the corporation tax, on the ground of double taxation. But the Bulletin was arguing to the point which heads this paper, that the corporate form should not be penalized, and not to its corollary, that it should not be privileged. To consider also the latter point is to conclude that all forms of business organizations will not receive the "like consideration and similar treatment" which the Bulletin demands until stockholders and partners and private owners are taxed alike on their accrued shares.

A TRANSFER OF ACCOUNTS

Quite the plainest fact in connection with the entire tax matter is that collection at the source and the graduated surtax do not mix. The corporation tax is in effect collection at the source. It penalizes each stockholder an equal amount regardless of his surtax class, which is not equitable if the graduated surtax is equitable. It was by trying to mix surtax and corporation tax that we acquired the inaccurate concept which considers a cash dividend to be income, instead of a mere distribution of income.

It is worthy of thought that much of the argument presented to the court in support of the position that a stock dividend was not income has equal application to the cash dividend. The declaration of any dividend is the affair of an instant; income, however, to an individual is a matter of a year or any other period which the law may set up. If a dividend is in stock, the stockholder has two shares instead of one, each, however, worth half as much as before in book value. If it is in cash, the book value of his remaining share has been depleted by the amount of the dividend. It is quite as difficult to believe that the latter as the former constitutes true income. The cash distribution of a partnership or the money an individual takes out of his private business is not considered to be a true measure of income, partner and owner being required to pay on 100 per cent of the amounts earned for their accounts. In what respect does a cash dividend from a corporation differ as a measure of income from a similar distribution by a partnership? Neither is a true measure of income, yet we treat it so in one case and not in the other. The cash dividend from a corporation is nothing more or less than the distribution of previously earned income, a mere transfer from one's corporate to his personal pocket.

One of the new recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury appears to recognize the substance of this fact.

This recommendation would admit dividends which are in liquidation of capital invested in a business to the capital gains preferential. This were well enough in itself, but it seems to be only further struggling with an unsound structure, trying to patch it up here and there, only increasing, however, its intricacies and inequalities. The holes in the present law are too wide and many for effective plugging. It were far better to tear down and build anew.

As for stockholders, the proper moment for their taxation arises when, for any given period, earnings have accrued in a corporation treasury for their accounts, rather than when some portion of them is distributed. Earnings not declared in dividends are reinvested for stockholders' accounts, constituting an addition to their wealth, which must be taxable if the law is to reach the vast volume of accruing but unreceived incomes which can stand taxation with least hardships. Could there well be a more absurd system than to erect as we have done a graduated surtax, to be applied to only that part of income which is needed in cash for expenditures?

Practically, a tax to include accrued incomes within corporation treasuries (to the stockholder) need not be difficult of execution. All corporations are now required to make a return of net income. The accrued income of preferred-stock holders would not be considered to exceed the preferred dividends paid. The accrued income of common-stock holders would equal net earnings per share. The objection would be raised that such a method would disturb the expansion of corporations by forcing more liberal cash-dividend policies in order that stockholders might have sufficient cash to pay their taxes. Doubtless many readjustments would follow, but desirable as corporation expansion may be, it can not be more desirable than the support of the Government and the gradual reduction of its funded debt. Corporations would doubtless become somewhat more responsive to the needs of their stockholders, and treasuries would be kept somewhat more liquid. There would remain adequate devices and means for such corporations as can afford expansion; but expansion would no longer be forced by the present invitation to exemption, but would once again be determined by the sound reasons of pre-war days, the opportunity presented and the means at hand. There would no longer exist the open invitation to incorporate all activities, including real-estate proprietorships which produce beyond the owner's requirements for living expenses, nor the penalty on incorporation for activities which do not. Cash-dividend policies would again be determined by the old and tried rules instead of by the willingness of stockholders to receive taxable cash. Stock dividends would lose some of their magic, their power over the minds of the gullible, but could be paid without penalty whenever sound finance should so dictate.

Application of this method of taxation to the affairs of Ford Motor Co. would free that corporation from the present 12½ per cent tax—at least one-seventh of $124,000,000, or $17,700,000—but would tax the stockholders for normal tax and surtax on income of at least $142,000,000—eight-sevenths of $124,000,000—in addition to what they now pay. Desirable as is the expansion of Ford Motor Co. even for private account, it would appear that $124,000,000 for expansion against $17,700,000 for taxes—plus the present stockholders' tax on whatever cash dividends are now paid and received—is a division which from the Government's standpoint overlooks the fact that there is no more efficient tax-gathering agency in the United States than this business and its stockholders.

Moreover, when an individual is in business for his own account at manufacturing, merchandising, or farming he can not expand his business with any part of its earned profits except as such profits have first been subjected to normal tax and surtax. The same is true of partners. Why not stockholders?

The loss of revenue from repeal of the corporation tax would be made up by greatly increased surtax collections. Though the Ford case is exceptional, a 25 per cent surtax in this case would yield an amount approximately double the present corporation tax. The amount of income which is now thus avoiding surtax is so prodigious that its taxation would in all probability not only compensate the Treasury for the loss of the corporation tax, but permit substantial reduction in surtax rates.

The "capital gains" preferential would no longer be required. It is recognized that if any kind of income deserves preferential treatment it is earned income, for the reasons recently stated by the Secretary of the Treasury. To repeal it would be no longer to encourage the flight of capital into municipals and to restore the normal methods of profit taking. Nor under such a tax system would there be any demand for this preferential.

The absurdity of the present "capital gains" law is nowhere better shown, perhaps, than in the recently suggested amendments to limit deductions for capital losses as an offset to the "capital gains" preferential. What of the taxpayer who has never had any capital gains to receive preferential treatment but suffers a severe capital loss? He may lose in a capital transaction every dollar he possesses and yet be taxable on a substantial income. To such non sequiturs and extremes of plugging are we forced by a law which begins with a wrong concept of what constitutes income.

Some administrative difficulties would doubtless arise in connection with the ownership of stock for brief periods. It would appear, however, that they would be inconsequential compared with those of the present law, and, in any event, there are more important considerations involved than making simple the tax returns of stock speculators.

We shall have high taxes for several decades. It were exceedingly unwise to attempt to bolster the provisions of an unsatisfactory law which encourages avoidances, the flight of capital into exempt investment, and unsound finance generally. It is exceedingly desirable that a new structure should be built which by its fairness and productivity will be entitled to endure. We need a law impartial, scientific, not more burdensome than revenue requirements necessitate, and, above all, so written that finance and industry may hark back to normal considerations in the conduct of their affairs. If they shall not be permitted to do so, we may be sure that the ultimate reckoning will be painful.

SEC. 228. (a) The shareholders of any corporation which is subject to the tax imposed by subdivision (a) or (b) of section 230 shall, if they all agree thereto in respect of any taxable year of the corporation, be taxed in the same manner as the members of a partnership. All the provisions of this title relating to partnerships and the members thereof shall so far as practicable apply to such corporation and the shareholders thereof. If all the shareholders are so taxed, the corporation shall be exempt from tax under section 230 for such taxable year.

(b) For the purposes of this section amounts distributed by such corporation during its taxable year shall be accounted for by the distributees; and any portion of the surtax net income (as defined in subdivision (c) of section 230) remaining undistributed at the close of its taxable year shall be accounted for by the shareholders of such corporation at the close of its taxable year in proportion to their respective shares.

(c) Any undistributed portion of the surtax net income (as defined in subdivision (c) of section 230) which is taxed to the shareholders under this section shall, when distributed, be exempt from tax to the distributees.

TAX ON CORPORATIONS

SEC. 230. In lieu of the tax imposed by section 230 of the revenue act of 1921 there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax of 12½ per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in sections 236 and 263.

(a) In lieu of the tax imposed by section 230 of the revenue act of 1921, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a normal tax of 9 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in sections 236 and 263.

(b) In addition to the normal tax imposed by subdivision (a) of this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the surtax net income (as defined in subdivision (c) of this section) of every corporation a surtax equal to the following percentage of the undistributed net income as defined in subdivision (c) of this section:

One-fourth of 1 per cent, if the undistributed net income is more than 10 per cent, but not more than 11 per cent, of the surtax net income;

(2) The term "undistributed net income" means the amount by which the surtax net income exceeds the sum of (1) the amount of the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of this section for the taxable year, plus (2) the amount of cash dividends paid during the 12 months preceding the 15th day of the third month following the close of the taxable year, plus (3) amounts retained to replace capital losses sustained after the enactment of this act, plus (4) amounts retained in compliance with law and the distribution of which is prohibited by law, plus (5) $10,000;

(3) The term "cash dividends" includes dividends paid in interest-bearing scrip, if subject to tax in the hands of the distributees to the same extent as a dividend paid in cash.

[2] Deficit.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and his coworkers have rendered the country a great service in the conference report which we have before us. I am going to support the conference report with pleasure. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], in my judgment, understands legislation of this kind better than any other man in public life, and the other members of the minority on the committee have cooperated with him earnestly. The bill is for the benefit of all the people and not a few.

I ask the privilege of placing in the RECORD my amendment raising the exemptions under this bill, an explanation of it, and, by the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, a letter he wrote me in regard to his objection to my amendment, which explains itself. The greatest objection I have to this splendid bill is that it does not raise the exemptions, and, as Senators know, I have tried to raise them to $2,000 for single men and $3,000 for married men. If I had my way, no married man with an income of less than $5,000 would be compelled to pay any tax on his income.

The Secretary of the Treasury opposes that, and takes the position that a man loses interest in his Government unless he pays, as he says, at least a few cents a week in direct taxes upon his income. He believes and urges that taxes of the rich, with large incomes, should be reduced more relatively than the man with small income.

I take the position that he already pays indirectly, through the tariff and special taxes, a great deal more than he should, and that it is not fair to tax him on his income when it is small. It was never intended when the sixteenth amendment was passed that persons with small incomes would be taxed. The burden of taxation placed on them through the protective tariff is already greater than can be borne.

The Secretary of the Treasury is a very able man, and I regret that he differs with me in my efforts to exempt from any and all taxes those whose incomes are not over $2,000 for single persons and $3,000 for married ones. He is spending many millions to collect the taxes on about 3,000,000 persons whose incomes are less than the amount I have tried to get exemption for. The Government, he says, does not collect from these small incomes more than $25,000,000, and the reports show it is costing the Government about half that to collect the taxes and check the returns of these 3,000,000 taxpayers. I think it is a waste of time and a great injustice to tax the man who must labor to earn a small income not sufficient to support a family, when the Government has to spend millions of dollars in collecting taxes on small incomes which amount to from one and a half cents to a few dollars. If my amendment could be adopted, it would relieve, as the Secretary of the Treasury says, three million of the four and one-half million taxpayers in the United States of paying any taxes whatever. The Government would lose in taxes less than $25,000,000 and it would require many millions to pay the employees of the Government who work on these tax returns.

Mr. President, about two years ago I offered an amendment to the revenue bill placing a smaller tax on the first few thousands earned by labor. I did not think a person whose income came from bonds should pay no more than a person who must earn a living for his family by hard work. Secretary Mellon opposed my measure then and the Republican Members of the Senate defeated it, though every Democrat supported my amendment. Now, in this bill Secretary Mellon recommends a reduction in taxes on earned incomes, and I am glad he has come around to my views. I hope and believe that next year, after he hears the views of the people of the country on my amendment, he will agree to exempt from taxation all single persons whose incomes are not over $2,000 and all married men with incomes not exceeding $3,000. Our people, three million of four and a half million who pay income tax, will not be willing to pay this small tax, from a few cents to a few dollars, when nearly all is spent in collecting it.

I ask to place in the RECORD my amendment and explanatory statement and the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. HARRIS to the bill (H. R. 6715) to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes, viz: On page 55, line 3, after the figures "$2,000," insert the following proviso: "Provided, That single persons whose net incomes do not exceed $2,000 each and heads of families or married persons living with husbands or wives whose net incomes do not exceed $3,000 each shall be exempt from payment of income tax and from rendering income-tax returns: Provided further, That in determining their net incomes such persons shall deduct the credits for dependents by paragraph (a) of this section."

AMENDMENT OF SENATOR HARRIS

Senator HARRIS'S amendment exempts all single persons whose net incomes do not exceed $2,000 each and all heads of families and married persons whose net incomes do not exceed $3,000 each from payment of any income tax whatever.

The effect of this amendment will be to relieve 2,500,000 men and women with small incomes from paying income tax; 2,500,000 is 57 per cent of all the taxpayers.

Based upon the income-tax statistics for 1921, Mr. McCoy, the Government actuary, estimates that the reduction in revenue receipts under this amendment would be about $18,000,000.

This loss of revenue will be largely offset by the great reduction in appropriations for salaries of employees and other operating expenses of the Income Tax Division of the Internal Revenue Bureau resulting from the decrease of 2,500,000, or 57 per cent, in the number of taxpayers.

The collection of income taxes is now costing the Government in the vicinity of $25,000,000, or an average of about $6 for each taxpayer.

Several hundred thousand of the taxpayers exempted by Senator HARRIS'S amendment now pay less than a dollar each, and many of them pay only a few cents. For instance, the income tax of a single man with an income of $1,001 or of a married man with an income of $2,501 is just 1½ cents under the tax rates in the revenue bill as it passed the House. The taxes range from 1½ cents to $15 for single persons and from 1½ cents to $7.50 for heads of families and married persons. The average is $7.50 for single persons and $3.75 for heads of families and married persons.

The difference in the effect of the amendment upon the tax of heads of families (including married persons) and upon single persons is due to the fact that the personal exemption is now $2,500 for the former (unless their incomes exceed $5,000 each), while it is only $1,000 for single persons.

For the vast majority of the 2,500,000 taxpayers exempted by the amendment the tax will be less than the average cost of collecting income taxes. For the Government to force a man to pay tax when it will cost more to collect it than the tax amounts to is uneconomical, to say the least, if it is not really absurd.

The 2,500,000 taxpayers exempted by the amendment of Senator HARRIS belong to the large class of laboring people whose small incomes are completely absorbed in providing the necessities of life. They are therefore entitled to special consideration by the Congress.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, May 19, 1924.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of May 7 with reference to the speech you made in the Senate on that day in support of your amendment. I think the principal objection to the increase in the exemptions on the smaller incomes is the fact that it removes so many individuals from any direct payment of tax, and, therefore, from any direct interest in their Government. In every other country having income taxes, the exemption is much smaller than in ours. I think in England it is £150. The amount that each person would save by the adoption of your amendment is entirely out of proportion to the public benefit of having many individuals contributing to the support of the Government, if only a few cents.

A single person with a net income of $30 a week—a good income for a young man or woman just starting life, with no one but himself to take care of—will pay, under the provisions of the House bill, and of the Senate bill as it now stands, in income tax to the Government, 16 cents per week. Under the present law he would pay 42⅞ cents per week. Under the Mellon plan he would pay a trifle less than 20½ cents per week, and under the Harris plan he would pay nothing.

A newly married man living with his wife, without other dependents, with a net income of $50 per week, would pay an income tax to the Government, under the pending bill, of less than 3 cents per week; under the present law, of less than 8 cents per week; and under the Mellon plan, of less than 4½ cents per week, while under the Harris plan he would pay nothing.

A head of a family with five dependents, receiving a net income of $80 per week, would pay income tax to the Government, under the pending bill, at the rate of a trifle less than 4⅝ cents per week; under the present law, at the rate of 12½ cents per week; under the Mellon plan, at the rate of a trifle less than 7 cents per week; and under the Harris plan, nothing.

The saving in cost of administration to the Government would more than likely be offset by the loss in revenue through failure of those to make returns who include in their deductions amounts which would not be allowed by the department.

Had the Harris proposal been in effect in 1921, the following would have been the result:

Number that would not have made returns that actually paid tax for that year	2,257,000
Tax paid by these taxpayers	$50,914,000
Average tax paid	$22.56
Estimated number that would not make returns, who otherwise would pay tax for 1924	3,000,000
Average tax under pending bill	$8.50
Loss in tax under pending bill, direct	$25,500,000
Loss in tax through failure to make returns	$15,000,000
Total loss	$40,500,000

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I am quite sympathetic with what has been said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. For his publicity amendment I voted when it was before the Senate, and if the opportunity presented itself, I would vote for it again. I am by no means certain that the plan he suggests, to send this bill back to conference, is the one which ought to be adopted at this time, in view of the important provisions of this measure, and in view, too, of the work that has been accomplished by the conferees.

The bill which has been presented by the conferees in my opinion is an infinitely better bill than that which was designated as the "Mellon plan." Not only is it infinitely better, but, what is more important, it is infinitely more just. The Mellon plan proceeded upon a particular philosophy concerning taxation. The plan which has just been agreed upon by the conferees of the two Houses proceeds upon an entirely different philosophy, and nothing will better illustrate this than the reading in juxtaposition of the amounts of taxation in a very few cases under the plan which has now been adopted by the conferees of the two Houses and the amounts levied under the Mellon plan and under that now in existence, and then the amounts under the three systems upon smaller incomes and a few of the larger incomes. Allow me to recall that under the present tax system an income of $3,000 pays $20. Under the Mellon plan it would have paid $11.25. Under the plan adopted by the conferees of the two Houses it will pay $7.50.

An income of $5,000 under the present system pays a tax of $100. Under the Mellon plan a tax would have been paid of $56.25. Under the Simmons plan, the plan just adopted, the tax will be $37.50.

An income of $10,000 under the present law pays a tax of $520 per annum. Under the Mellon plan it would have paid $337.50. Under the plan just adopted it will pay $207.50.

Turn now to the larger incomes and the difference in theory is at once obvious. Under an income of $100,000, taxes to-day are paid of $30,140. Under the Mellon plan there would have been paid $19,817.50. Under the plan adopted by the conferees of the two Houses the tax will be $22,617.50.

An income of $300,000 to-day pays $144,640. Under the Mellon plan it would have paid $81,817.50. Under the plan the conferees of the two Houses have adopted the tax will be $109,617.50.

An income of a million dollars under the present system pays $550,640. Under the Mellon plan it would have paid $298,817.50. Under the plan adopted by the conferees of the two Houses it will be required to pay $429,617.50.

So, if we read the incomes that are $10,000 and less, and the incomes that are $100,000 and more, and compare the amounts which would have been paid under the Mellon plan and the amounts that will be paid under the plan adopted by the conferees of the two Houses, we observe that the first desideratum of the Mellon plan was to aid those incomes which are very high, and the recipients of which are most able to pay taxes, while the theory upon which the conferees of the two Houses have acted is that we should deal first with those who are down on the ground, who are least able to pay taxes, and it is this theory which the conferees of the two Houses of Congress have now happily adopted.

It will be recalled that the Mellon plan, when presented to the country, was so sacrosanct that it was proclaimed far and wide it could not be profaned by amendment or by modification. You remember how the propaganda went forth in this land when first the Mellon plan was promulgated. What was demanded was not really tax reduction at all, but only tax reduction as commanded by Mr. Mellon, and the adoption of his plan without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t"; a particular plan, which is now demonstrated by the action of the conference of the two Houses of Congress of the United States to have had for its first consideration the large incomes and for its minor consideration the smaller incomes in this land.

Propaganda such as never before had been seen in the United States was indulged in in behalf of this plan. Indeed, if I recollect correctly, two official communications from the White House were published in the press, that the Congress must not touch the sacred Mellon plan; that if it dared to amend it, or if it dared to modify it, forthwith it would receive the disapproval of those in high places, and could never become a law.

Then our people were frightened by repeated statements—some officially made and some by subservient echoes—that the only way by which we could accord tax reduction to a tax-burdened people was through the adoption of this one system, and this one system alone; and that if any other were attempted great deficits would occur in the Treasury; deficits which could not be met except by additional and larger burdens of taxation. Not only have stories such as that gone forth day after day, and been published in the great metropolitan journals week after week and month after month, not only have we seen the greatest conspiracy that was ever entered into for the dissemination of propaganda in this country in behalf of a particular plan, but in the last few weeks it has been declared again and again by the spokesmen for power that if we dared pass the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill we could not have tax reduction at all.

I call to the attention of Members of the Senate the estimates which have been presented here this morning, the estimates presented by the very able Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the estimates presented by the very able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], which demonstrate beyond cavil that all the statements that have been made about the inability to have tax reduction and adjusted compensation are utterly without foundation in fact. Both are now accomplished. I recall those estimates, because I remember that some of us indulged in animadversions, very mild, of course, upon the original estimates made when the Mellon plan was first presented to us, and we met the fate of all who are guilty of lese majesty. The Mellon plan is now demonstrated to have been founded first upon an economic fallacy, and secondly upon absolutely inaccurate estimates emanating from the Treasury Department. The Mellon plan, I am very glad to say, was shot to pieces in the House of Representatives, and now finds itself buried beyond resurrection by the trump of the archangel Gabriel in the Senate of the United States.

I congratulate the Senate and I congratulate the House. I congratulate the conferees who have rendered the service they have rendered in bringing back these rates of taxation and giving to this country true tax reductions.

They have given to the country not Mellon-plan tax reduction, it is true, but they have given the country just tax reduction, tax reduction which deals most generously with those least able to pay taxes, which deals generously with those most able to pay taxes; but which does not first concern itself with the latter. The burden is first lightened of those least able to bear that burden, and justice is done to all.

I ask leave to print the figures as to seven incomes of $10,000 and under, and of seven incomes of $100,000 and over, with the taxes paid under the present system, what they would be under the Mellon plan, and what they will be under the Simmons plan.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the question of tax reduction has two phases. Everybody, of course, would be for tax reduction, but at the same time, if the taxes are reduced, the payments on the national debts are reduced. So I feel that a good part of the propaganda for tax reduction has been for the purpose of avoiding the payments for the war. The farther we can get away from the war in the levying of taxes, the safer will be the war profiteers. I presume Mr. Mellon himself was one of the great war profiteers, and I presume his plan was fixed with a view to protecting those gentlemen throughout. I am quite sure it was.

As for myself, I am in favor of increasing certain taxes. That is why I am opposed to this conference report. The original bill was amended by the Senate through the adoption of the corporation tax amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], which increased the taxes on certain corporations. The smaller corporations got a reduction, but the larger corporations got an increase, bringing them up somewhere near parallel with the individual incomes.

I am for that kind of an increase in taxation. In fact, during the last Congress there was a reduction of the surtaxes from 65 to 50 per cent, making a reduction on the 65 per cent paid by the big income-tax payer of 23 per cent of all his taxes.

With a view to equalizing these matters somewhat, I offered the excess-profits tax as an amendment to this bill when it was before the Senate. I offered that amendment, raising the exemption from $3,000 up to $6,000. I withdrew it when the corporation tax amendment was adopted, because in a large measure that tax covered the same ground, and it was just and reasonable, as I felt.

The bill went to conference, and the conferees dropped the corporation tax entirely, and it is out of order for me to offer my excess-profits tax amendment at this time. Therefore it will be impossible to get a direct vote upon that.

I am sorry the conferees did not insist upon the corporation tax. I am sorry they did not insist upon complete publicity, and I shall vote against the report because they did not do those two things.

That, however, does not mean that I would not vote to override a presidential veto, which in this case seems to be a Mellon veto, because we are informed that Mr. Mellon intends to have this bill vetoed. When that stage comes I may vote to pass it over the veto, if he succeeds in having it vetoed, because then it would be a question of comparing it with the old law. If it is better for the common people than the old law, I shall vote for it, but at this time it is a question of sending it back to conference to restore the corporation tax and to restore the publicity feature. For those reasons I oppose the conference report.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] presented a very able statement of the differences between this bill, the bill as it passed the Senate, and the bill as it passed the House. I do not think any statement has been presented showing the differences between the present law and the conference bill. I believe the public would be interested in knowing the differences.

I therefore offer a statement in tabloid form setting forth all the changes made by the conferees in the present law. Senators having inquiries as to what changes have been made in the law will be able to get some assistance from the tabloid statement which I submit showing some 30 changes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement presented by the Senator from Massachusetts will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WALSH OF MASSACHUSETTS ON IMPORTANT CHANGES IN THE EXISTING LAW BY THE PROPOSED REVENUE BILL, AS AGREED UPON BY THE CONFERENCE COMMITTEE, AND AS IT WILL BE PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS SIGNATURE

1. The bill contains a provision for a reduction of 25 per cent in the tax payable in 1924 on the incomes of 1923.

2. The tax upon corporations remains as under the present law; to wit, a flat tax of 12½ per cent upon the net income of corporations. The present capital stock tax is retained.

3. The rates of the estate tax which in the existing law range from 1 per cent of the amount of the net estate not in excess of $50,000 to 25 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $10,000,000 have been altered to range from 1 per cent of the net estate not in excess of $50,000, to 40 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $10,000,000.

4. For the calendar year 1924 and each calendar year thereafter a tax is imposed upon transfers by gift of any property whether made directly or indirectly. The rate of the gift tax ranges from 1 per cent of the amount of taxable gifts not in excess of $50,000 to 40 per cent of the amount by which the taxable gifts exceed $10,000,000.

5. The existing law provides for a normal tax upon the first $4,000 of net income of 4 per cent, and upon the remainder of the net income of 8 per cent. The bill provides for a normal tax rate of (1) 2 per cent upon the first $4,000 of net income; (2) 4 per cent upon the next $4,000 of net income; and (3) 6 per cent upon the amount of net income in excess of the amounts taxed under (1) and (2). The amount of the personal exemption of a married person living with spouse or the head of a family has been made $2,500 in all cases.

6. The surtax rates are reduced so as to begin at 1 per cent on the net income from $10,000 to $14,000; and reach a maximum of 40 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $500,000. The existing law provides for surtaxes beginning at 1 per cent upon the net income between $6,000 and $10,000, and reaching a maximum of 50 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $200,000.

7. In the case of an individual, the tax is to be credited with 25 per cent of the amount of the tax which would be payable if his earned net income constituted his entire net income, but not in excess of 25 per cent of his normal tax. Earned income is defined as wages, salaries, professional fees, and other amounts received as compensation for personal services actually rendered, including in the case of a taxpayer engaged in a trade or business in which both personal services and capital are material income-producing factors, a reasonable allowance as compensation for personal services, not in excess of 20 per cent of the taxpayer's share of the net proceeds of the trade or business. It is provided that net incomes of $5,000 and less shall be considered as earned, and that at least $5,000 of net incomes in excess of that amount shall be considered as earned. It is further provided that the amount of the net income shall not be considered to be in excess of $10,000.

8. It is provided that the amount by which the tax is reduced on account of losses from the sale of capital assets shall not exceed 12½ per cent of the loss. There is no such limit in the present law.

9. The principle contained in the revenue act of 1918 that liquidating dividends constitute a sale of the stock instead of a distribution of earnings has been restored. This puts liquidating dividends within the capital gains section of the bill and recognizes the real effect of such dividends.

10. The section with reference to reorganization of corporations has been rewritten to eliminate existing uncertainties in the present act and to include other usual forms of corporate reorganization in aid of business, such as the splitting of one corporation into two or more corporations.

11. Provisions have been inserted to prevent the use of the reorganization section to escape proper taxation by increasing the basis for depreciation or depletion, or by increasing the basis for determining gain or decreasing the basis for determining loss from the sale of assets transferred in connection with the reorganization, or by distributing as capital gains what are, in effect, dividends out of earnings.

12. The deduction for discovery depletion is limited to 50 per cent of the net income from the property depleted.

13. In the case of a trust where the trustee has the discretion to distribute the income or not the income is taxed to the beneficiary if distributed and to the trustee if not distributed.

14. Where the grantor of a trust reserves the right to change the trust in favor of himself the income of the trust is taxed to the grantor.

15. The tax under section 220 which seeks to penalize corporate forms used to avoid imposition of the surtaxes on the stockholders is now based on all of the income of the corporation which will be taxed in the hands of an individual. The rate of tax has been changed from 25 per cent to 50 per cent in the bill as reported.

16. The application of the present law requiring income for a fractional part of a year to be placed on an annual basis is restricted to cases where a return is made for part of a year as the result of voluntary act of the taxpayer in making a change in his taxable year.

17. A Board of Tax Appeals, the members to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, is created to hear appeals from the assessment of additional income and estate taxes. The board will sit locally in the various judicial circuits throughout the country. The cases of both the Government and the taxpayer will be presented before the board, and the practice will be similar to that before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Upon a decision in favor of the Government the additional tax can be assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the taxpayer is left to his remedy in the courts for a recovery of the tax. If the decision is in favor of the taxpayer, the commissioner may not assess the tax, but is left to his remedy in the courts in a suit to collect it. In any court proceedings the findings of the board shall be taken as prima facie evidence of the facts contained therein.

18. The tax on telephone and telegraph messages is repealed.

19. Title VI of the existing law imposing a tax on beverages and the constituent parts thereof is repealed.

20. The excise tax upon automobiles and trucks is retained with a provision exempting from the tax chassis of trucks sold for less than $1,000 and truck bodies sold for less than $200. Under the present law there are no similar exemptions. The tax on tires, inner tubes, parts, and accessories sold to any person other than manufacturer is reduced from 5 to 2½ per cent.

21. The tax imposed upon admissions by Title VIII of the existing law is changed to apply only to admissions in excess of 50 cents.

22. The taxes imposed upon candy, knives, dirks, livery and hunting garments, and yachts, by paragraphs (6), (8), (9), (12), (13), and (14) of section 900 of Title IX of the existing law are repealed.

23. The taxes imposed upon carpets, trunks, valises, purses, lighting fixtures, and fans by section 904 of Title IX of the existing law are repealed.

24. A tax of 10 per cent is imposed upon sales by manufacturer of mah jong and similar tile sets.

25. The tax upon the sale of jewelry has been amended so that it will not apply to articles used for religious purposes or to articles sold for an amount not in excess of $30.

26. The taxes imposed upon proprietors of theaters, circuses, and other public exhibitions by paragraphs (5), (6), and (7) of section 1001 are repealed.

27. Brokers exclusively engaged in negotiating purchases and sales of produce and merchandise are exempted from the occupational tax of $50 imposed upon brokers.

28. The tax imposed upon sales of produce by paragraph (4) of Schedule A of Title XI (stamp taxes) is reduced from 2 cents per $100 to 1 cent.

29. The stamp tax of 2 cents for each $100 imposed upon drafts, checks, and promissory notes, is repealed.

30. Publicity—

(a) It is provided that returns shall be open for inspection to the Ways and Means Committee, the Finance Committee, or a special committee of either House. The amount of income tax paid by any individual within the district will be available for inspection in each collector's office.

(b) It is provided that all hearings in contested cases before the Board of Tax Appeals shall be open to the public, and that all evidence before the board taken down in writing and the record of the board shall be open to public inspection.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Statistics of Income, issued by the Treasury Department, showing the income-tax returns for each year, together with the tax paid, segregated by the size of the net income into brackets, should be studied and understood by everybody who has bills to pay. It is true that this document is a dry skeleton of facts, but within the tables contained therein is buried all necessary information for the conscientious student or intelligent voter. For example, the Statistics for 1921, the latest issued, covering the returns of income earned in the calendar year 1921, the tax on which was paid in 1922, shows that that year 6,662,176 returns of personal income were made, reporting net income of $19,577,212,528. Of these, only 3,589,985 reported tax due the Government, amounting to $719,387,106. The exemptions and personal credits of the other 3,072,191 individuals more than equaled their net income, leaving nothing upon which to pay tax.

This means that the total income tax was paid by about 3¼ per cent of the total population, the other 96¾ per cent paying no direct tax to the United States. Of the 24,500,000 families of the United States as of that year, only some 3,500,000 had any tax to pay; about 14½ per cent of the total families, or about 7 families out of every 50, paid direct tax to the United States.

The net income of all individuals in the United States was over $40,000,000,000 for that year. The income tax—$719,000,000—was therefore about 1.8 per cent of the total income, and about 3.6 per cent of the income returned by the 6,990,000 individuals.

There were 172,359 individuals with net income in excess of $10,000, whose tax amounted to $557,726,000, based upon a net income of $3,983,019,000. That is, forty-two two hundred and seventy-fifths of 1 per cent of the entire population paid over 77 per cent of the entire income tax, or less than 10 per cent of the total income pays over 77 per cent of the total tax.

There were with incomes in excess of $50,000, 11,089 individuals, with net income of $1,045,234,000, whose tax amounted to $317,929,000. That is, one one-hundredth of 1 per cent of the total population paid over 44 per cent of the total income tax, or about 2½ per cent of the total income pays over 44 per cent of the total tax.

There were with incomes in excess of $100,000, 2,352 individuals, with net income of $463,003,000, whose tax amounted to $202,217,000. That is, one four hundred and fortieth of 1 per cent of the total population pays over 28 per cent of the total income tax, or about 1⅛ per cent of the total income pays over 28 per cent of the total tax.

There were with net income in excess of $150,000, 985 individuals with net income of $299,582,000, whose tax amounted to $149,887,000. That is, one eleven-hundredth of 1 per cent of the total population paid about 21 per cent of the total income tax, or three-fourths of 1 per cent of the income paid 21 per cent of the total tax.

The present system of income tax began March 1, 1913. When the World War began and we needed large additional revenue both for our own use and for the aid of our allies the rates of this original income tax were very much increased, especially the higher rates, purely as a war measure. The original normal tax of 1 per cent was increased to 4 per cent and 8 per cent. The maximum surtax rate was increased from 6 per cent to 65 per cent. The lower brackets, beginning at $5,000, were only increased 1 per cent. The oppressively high rates of this war tax were reduced by the 1921 revenue act. Business was so demoralized that the receipts from the income tax fell off alarmingly. In 1921 the returns were $1,420,000,000, or only 41 per cent of the returns for 1919, a falling off in revenue of over two billions of dollars. This condition gave great concern to the Treasury. The 1921 revenue act eliminated the excess-profits tax on corporations and substituted in place of this tax and the flat 10 per cent tax on the balance of the net income of the corporation as imposed by the 1918 law a flat tax of 12½ per cent. The individual income tax was reduced from a maximum of 65 per cent at a $1,000,000 income to a maximum of 50 per cent at an income of $200,000. The tax on the lower brackets was also reduced. For example, the 1 per cent surtax on income in excess of $5,000 and not in excess of $6,000 was eliminated. The tax on the bracket from $8,000 to $10,000 of 3 per cent was reduced to 1 per cent. That is, the act of 1921 reduced the taxes on the small incomes as well as on the larger. It reduced the maximum surtax on the million-dollar man 23 per cent and that on the $6,000 man 100 per cent and on the $10,000 man 67 per cent. The 1924 revenue act still further reduces these surtax rates. On all incomes up to and including $10,000 it reduces the surtax 100 per cent. On the million-dollar man, however, it reduces the maximum rate only 20 per cent.

Under the provision of the present law the tax on a married man without dependents, with a net income of $5,000, is 2 per cent of his net income. Secretary Mellon recommended that it be reduced to 1.125 per cent of his net income. The pending act actually reduces the tax to three-fourths of 1 per cent of the net income. Upon a like taxpayer with an income of $10,000 these rates are as follows: Present law, 5.20 per cent; Mellon recommendation, 3.38 per cent; pending act, 2.08 per cent. Upon a like taxpayer with a net income of $3,000 the rates of tax are as follows: Present law, two-thirds of 1 per cent; Mellon plan, thirty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent; pending act, one-fourth of 1 per cent.

Taxpayers returning net incomes of less than $10,000 constitute over 97 per cent of all those that make returns for income tax, while about fifteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent of our total population have net incomes in excess of $10,000. A similar taxpayer with a net income of $100,000 would pay the following rates of tax upon his net income: Present law, 30.14 per cent; Mellon plan, 19.82 per cent; pending act, 22.62 per cent.

This shows that while the Mellon plan reduced the tax on the $500,000 man 34 per cent, and the pending act about 25 per cent, the Mellon plan reduced the tax on the $3,000 man fully 43 per cent; on the $5,000 man, 43⅓ per cent; and on the $10,000 man 35 per cent, while the pending act reduced these taxes on the $3,000 man 62 per cent; on the $5,000 man 62½ per cent; and on the $10,000 man 60 per cent.

What do these reductions mean? The $3,000-a-year man receives wages at the rate of $57.70 a week. Under the present law his total income tax is a little less than 39 cents a week; the Mellon proposal would have made it a little less than 22 cents a week; the pending bill will make it a little less than 14½ cents per week.

The $5,000 man receives a trifle over $96 a week. His total income tax under the present law is about $1.92½ per week. Under the Mellon plan it would be about $1.08 per week; and under the pending act, about 72 cents per week, a reduction from the Mellon plan of 36 cents per week.

Will these reductions to the man whose income is less than $5,000 benefit anyone?

The $100,000 man, most likely a business man, engaged in supplying or manufacturing necessities, pays income tax to the Government under the present law amounting to $30,140; under the Mellon plan he would pay $19,817.50; and under the pending act $22,617.50. The saving in his tax under the Mellon plan would be a little over $10,300. This saving, in order to meet competition, would have to be shared with his customers. More than likely part of it would go back into business enlargement, enabling him to take advantage of cash discounts, and so forth, and so enable him to produce and sell cheaper. The share to his customers, together with the lower cost of production, would consequently reduce the cost of living to his customers, and would finally result in a reduction in the price of all necessities of at least 10 per cent. To the $3,000 man this would mean a saving of over $5 per week; to the $5,000 man it means over $9 a week.

Compare the effect of this 34 per cent reduction in tax on the moderately large business income upon the $3,000 and $5,000 man with the effect of the reduction in their own income tax. By reducing the higher income-tax rates you save the $3,000 man $5 a week, or over twelve times the entire tax he pays under the present law, and the $5,000 man about five times his total income tax. The deception and fallacy in relieving from tax the smaller incomes while taxing heavily the larger is very evident. Under the present law less than 1.2 per cent of the entire net income of the people of this country pay over 28 per cent of the total income tax. If we should take their entire net income—that is, tax all incomes in excess of $100,000 100 per cent—we should have only a vanishing $463,000,000, or some $200,000,000 short of the amount necessary for the Government. This shows that it is impossible to raise the necessary revenue from a tax upon the large incomes only.

A business man must pay his income tax from his income. In addition to the profits necessary for his continuance in business he must add an amount sufficient to pay this tax. This must necessarily be obtained through larger profits—an increase in the cost of living. His tax must be paid by every consumer of his products, which must constitute a greater tax or higher price for the millions of consumers than the present law now imposes upon them directly.

This shows that it is impossible to tax the larger incomes without imposing a greater burden upon the wage earner. The entire theory of operating the Government by taxing about 1 per cent of the people, when probed is shown to be an economic fallacy and a physical and financial impossibility. If the reformers really want to benefit the small taxpayer they should reduce the tax upon the producer of his bread, his clothing, and of all his necessities. This will not only help the small taxpayer, but everyone else, and the final result will be a material reduction in the cost of living, together with every incentive to increase wages to the deserving.

I shall vote for this bill because it is an improvement over the existing law, but it is far, very far, from a wise disposition of the subject.

It seeks popularity at the expense of the people, and my hope is that the taxpayers and the wage earners will study this tax problem and insist upon an intelligent solution in the near future.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Atlanta Journal of May 23, 1924, by Mr. David Lawrence, which explains the pending bill and refers to the splendid work which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has done in connection with the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

REPUBLICAN LEADERS UNEQUAL TO THE STRATEGY OF SENATOR SIMMONS

[By David Lawrence]

(Copyright for Morning News)

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 22.—A little general from North Carolina, Senator FURNIFOLD MCLENDELL SIMMONS, has outmaneuvered the entire Republican leadership, including President Coolidge, Secretary Mellon, and the legislative managers of the Republican Party in Congress. For though the Republicans are in control of Congress a tax bill written by the minority—the Democrats—will become law.

Senator SIMMONS, perhaps the most experienced man on tax matters in the upper House and one who has served long on the Finance Committee in the preparation of the revenue acts of previous years, was assisted by the strategy of Representative GARNER, Democrat, of Texas, in the House.

Altogether they have put through a bill that President Coolidge will sign chiefly because he can not afford to veto it. The objectionable features—the publicity of tax returns and the undistributed-profits tax—have been eliminated, and one suspects now they were put in there in the first place for trading purposes, so as to insure the retention of the Simmons rates when the conference committee acted.

It is one of the most amazing legislative developments in a generation. The Democrats, of course, were aided by the insurgent Republicans, without whose votes the Simmons rates would not have prevailed; but the Republican leadership had the same opportunity as the Democrats did to win these insurgents. The regular Republican leaders privately are disappointed, for they could have written the type of the bill Senator SIMMONS offered, but they were restrained by the desire of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury that a record vote be obtained on the Mellon plan. The chief difference between the Mellon proposal and the Simmons rates is that persons with incomes running up to $66,000 a year will get a greater reduction in taxes under the Simmons plan than under the Mellon plan. Under $66,000 and running to $100,000 the reductions would have been greater under the Mellon plan, though there is really only a slight difference. Above $100,000, however, the differences are material.

The Mellon plan would have cut the taxes of the persons of larger income, the theory being that such a procedure would help business by stimulating capital to go into productive enterprises. Senator SIMMONS introduced as a counterproposal the idea that under his plan more individuals would benefit—some 6,600,000—and argued that the persons of larger income were not suffering now. As between the two ideas the insurgent Republican group chose to follow Senator SIMMONS.

All parties were agreed on the plan to give the taxpayers a flat 25 per cent reduction on taxes payable this year on 1923 incomes. It has been retained in the bill approved by the conference committee, which will become law. This provides that a taxpayer on June 15 next will not pay the same quarterly installment which he paid on March 15. Instead he will be obliged to pay much less. For instance, if his total tax bill for 1923 was $1,000 and, therefore, he paid a fourth on March 15, he will subtract the one-fourth reduction granted by the new law, which makes a final tax of $750, and he will credit himself with the $250 already paid in March, so that the balance due the Government will be $500, which can be paid in installments of $166.66 each on June 15, September 15, and December 15.

Here is a table which shows what taxes will be payable during 1925 on incomes received during 1924:

Taxes payable during 1925 on incomes received during 1924

The foregoing table is calculated on the return of a married man and no dependents.

Out of the 6,662,176 taxpayers in the United States approximately 6,109 would have been given greater reductions under the Mellon plan than the Simmons plan. This leaves 6,662,176 taxpayers who will receive a greater reduction under the Simmons plan, which will become law, than the original Mellon plan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. ROBINSON asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I understand that if present he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]; but, understanding that he would vote as I propose to vote, I am at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. He is absent; but I understand that if present he would vote as I propose to vote. Being therefore at liberty to vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. My colleague [Mr. WILLIS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. Were he present he would vote "yea." He has a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who, I understand, if present, would also vote "yea."

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I am informed by the pair clerk that if that Senator were present he would vote as I have already voted. So I will let my vote stand.

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS]. If the Senator from Indiana were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], if present, would vote "yea." I also wish to announce that, if present, the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], and the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], who is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], would both vote "yea."

I wish further to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. If present, the Senator from Oklahoma would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], if present, would vote "yea."

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, ETC.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 25), which was read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House is authorized and directed, in enrolling the bill (H. R. 8350) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes," to amend the language of the first paragraph of Title IV of said bill under the captions "Title IV, Department of Labor, Office of the Secretary," so as to read as follows: Salaries: Secretary of Labor, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, Second Assistant Secretary, and other personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $171,900; in all, $183,900.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is to correct a mistake in enrolling the appropriation bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the mistake?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There was left out the aggregate of $171,900, which was the amount carried in the paragraph, exclusive of the Secretary's salary, but, including the Secretary's salary, the aggregate is $183,900.

Mr ROBINSON. Does it increase the appropriation intended to be carried in the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It does not.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is merely a correction?

Mr. JONES of Washington. As a matter of fact, it shows a smaller appropriation than apparently the bill showed as enrolled. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on concurring in the resolution.

The resolution was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, May 25, 1924, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, May 24, 1924

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, about Thy holy name cling and cluster all the abiding hopes that are dear and sacred to the human heart. Unto Thee we look for the fulfillment of all the desires and aspirations that make life worth while. Lead us by Thy Spirit and direct us in that pathway that preserves us from the regrets of a defeated life. Spare us from the loss of an undiscovered God. Bless us with a pure and upright heart, and give us the spiritual discernment that makes its way through the forces of this busy, burdened world. In the precious name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTING ENROLLMENT OF H. R. 8350

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House is authorized and directed in enrolling the bill (H. R. 8350), entitled "An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes," to amend the language of the first paragraph of Title IV of said bill under the caption "Title IV, Department of Labor, office of Secretary," so as to read as follows: "Salaries: Secretary of Labor, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, Second Assistant Secretary, and other personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $171,900; in all, $183,900."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if I may take just a minute to explain this resolution. When the bill was engrossed the engrossing clerk left out the figures $171,900 and made it appear that $183,900 was appropriated for clerical hire and Assistant Secretaries and $12,000 for the Secretary's salary. If this is not corrected it will appear to be appropriating $12,000 more than was appropriated by the act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill making appropriations for the Agricultural Department for the fiscal year 1925, disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does the gentleman have to say as to the amendment put into the bill by the House to put some teeth into the packer legislation and to give the Secretary the right under certain circumstances to suspend commission men for violations of the law or rules and regulations, for instance, to bring on a boycott against the farmers' cooperative organizations? Is the gentleman willing to give the House an opportunity to vote on that proposition before he agrees to it?

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not ask us to commit ourselves on a bill before we go into conference.

Mr. RUBEY. I feel like it in view of the action on that occasion. I believe I ought to insist on the gentleman agreeing to come back to the House before agreeing to it.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I think the gentleman did me a great injustice on that occasion.

Mr. RUBEY. Which gentleman?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman from Chicago——

Mr. MADDEN. Did me the great injustice to which he refers. My business if I go to a conference will be as one of the conferees to represent the House. I hope that no embarrassment will be placed upon the conferees.

Mr. RUBEY. In view of the vote of the House passing that amendment, will the gentleman stand by it?

Mr. MADDEN. I will not agree to any embargo to be placed on us in the beginning. I think it is only fair to let us go to conference, and if there is anything in which the House is interested we will not violate any of the House's rights——

Mr. RUBEY. Well, I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. If the gentleman from Illinois will remember, let me call his attention to the status of this matter at that time. It was put on by an almost unanimous vote of the House of Representatives and it was unanimously reported, but not wanting a special rule, it was merely attached as an amendment. It seems to me the gentleman from Illinois ought to assure the House that he will come back and let us have a vote because this is very important legislation in which every cattle man in the United States is interested. There is not a man in the United States who raises a cow who is not interested in that amendment. It seems to me the gentleman ought to be willing to come back and give the House a chance to vote upon it so that the Senate may know, if they decline to recede and concur in the House amendment, the House will have an opportunity to vote.

Mr. MADDEN. All right. I think the House is entitled to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. MAGEE of New York, WASON, MADDEN, BUCHANAN, and LEE of Georgia.

Mr. MAGEE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to reverse the order of naming the conferees, changing it to Messrs. MADDEN, MAGEE of New York, WASON, BUCHANAN, and LEE of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING MONDAY

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER. There is a session to-morrow. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we are all having important committee meetings.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, as I announced yesterday, in all probability the Senate will act upon the tax bill to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not going to object, but it is working the Members very hard.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And Monday will probably be the last District day, so that I ask to meet at 11 o'clock for that reason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RELIEF OF THE HEIRS OF AGNES INGELS

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 365 and agree to the Senate request for a conference on the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take the Senate bill referred to from the Speaker's table and agree to the conference requested by the Senate, which bill the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 365) for the relief of Ellen B. Walker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DAM IN TALLAHATCHIE RIVER

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to prefer a unanimous-consent request, namely, to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 3272, have immediate consideration of the bill, and I ask just a moment to explain it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3272) granting the consent of Congress to the Panola-Quitman Drainage District to construct, maintain, and operate a dam in Tallahatchie River.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, this is a real emergency in my district. The bonds have been issued and sold, the money is ready, the organization is ready, and they plan to do that drainage this summer. Right at the last it was found that they had to have the consent of Congress for a dam which they wanted to build. It was so important that they sent the county attorney and engineer here and kept them here a week at their expense in order to get this bill in shape so that they can go to work at once. Now, the bill has been passed by the Senate, has been approved by the House committee, and it ought to take not more than a few minutes to pass it. It will relieve a very serious condition immediately in the district I represent, and it ought not to take three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if there will be no delay by any speeches, and if the bill is acted on at once, I shall not object.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Has this bill been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes; and approved by that committee.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Senate bill?

Mr. LOWREY. The Senate bill. They approved my bill, which is the same—verbatim, literatim, and "punctuatim"—as the Senate bill, exactly the same; and I ask to substitute the Senate bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course, there are many bills which other Members are holding on the Unanimous Consent Calendar; and if a matter like this is permitted to pass, there may be many other such requests.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I take it, when the gentleman from Mississippi states that this is an emergency and the Speaker has recognized him, that a real emergency exists.

Mr. LOWREY. This is a very serious emergency. I have put it before the Speaker and he thought it was such an emergency as to warrant him in recognizing me for the purpose of having the bill considered.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Panola-Quitman Drainage District to construct, maintain, and operate a dam in Tallahatchie River, at or near Porters Ferry, Panola County, Miss.: Provided, That the work shall not be commenced until the plans therefor have been submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That this act shall not be construed to authorize the use of such dam to develop water power or generate hydroelectric energy.

SEC. 2. That the authority granted by this act shall cease and be null and void unless the actual construction of the dam hereby authorized is commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval of this act: Provided, That from and after 30 days' notice from the Federal Power Commission, or other authorized agency of the United States, to said drainage district, or its successor, that desirable water-power development will be interfered with by the existence of said dam, the authority hereby granted to construct, maintain, and operate said dam shall terminate and be at an end; and any grantee or licensee of the United States proposing to develop a power project at or near said dam shall have authority to remove, submerge, or utilize said dam under such conditions as said commission or other agency may determine, but such conditions shall not include compensation for the removal, submergence, or utilization of said dam.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOWREY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Claims, I ask unanimous consent that on next Thursday evening, between the hours of 8 and 11 o'clock, it shall be in order to consider bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to.

The SPEAKER. Commencing where we left off last time?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; commencing where we left off last time. I understand that about half the bills were reached.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that there be a session of the House next Thursday evening from 8 to 11 o'clock for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to, commencing where we ended at the last session. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, but after that request is granted, I should like to make a unanimous consent request to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AUTHORIZING EXAMINATIONS AND SURVEYS OF STREAMS

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8070) authorizing preliminary examinations and surveys of sundry streams with a view to the control of their floods, and ask unanimous consent to agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana calls up a House bill with Senate amendments which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Senate amendments were read.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

PARCEL POST AND FOURTH-CLASS POSTAGE RATES

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the proposed increase of parcel-post and fourth-class postage rates.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there have come to my office a great many protests against increases in parcel-post and fourth-class mail rates as embodied in the Paige bill, H. R. 7016, and the Kelly bill, H. R. 8437. Most of these protests come from farmers and community clubs. On inquiry I find that the same character of protests have come to Congressmen from all sections of the country.

In order to get accurate information in tabulated form showing just what the effect of these proposed increases would be, I asked the Third Assistant Postmaster General to submit an analysis of these two bills, showing the proposed increases and the percentage of such increases over the rates provided for in the present law. An examination of the table furnished will disclose that in some instances decreases are provided for, but in general, if the rates carried in either bill should be enacted into law, there would result a very large increase both in parcel-post and fourth-class rates.

In view of the very unfavorable economic condition now prevailing among the agricultural class and the further fact that farmers utilize the parcel post more than any other class, I do not believe it would be advisable at this time to increase the rates as suggested. It would only intensify their hardships and would be unjustifiable from any standpoint. If there must be an increase in postal revenues, such increase should be derived from some other source. Personally I believe that until the commission appointed for the purpose of studying parcel post and other rates has submitted its findings Congress should take no action whatever in changing postal rates. It will be time enough when all the facts are in its possession to take appropriate action.

Following is the communication of the Third Assistant Postmaster General:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, May 11, 1924.

Hon. WILLIAM WILLIAMSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WILLIAMSON: I have your letter of the 10th instant in regard to the present rates of postage on fourth-class or parcel-post mail as compared with those proposed in House bills 7016 and 8437, respectively, now pending in Congress.

The following tables show the difference between the rates contemplated by H. R. 7016 and the present rates applicable to fourth-class mail:

Books, seeds, bulbs, and plants

		Present rate	Proposed rate	Increase	Per cent of increase

	Seventh zone	11	9	[1] 2	[2] 18
	Eighth zone	12	9	[1] 3	[2] 25

[1] Decrease. [2] Per cent of decrease.

The present rate on fourth-class mail, other than books, seeds, bulbs, and plants, when sent in parcels weighing not more than 4 ounces, is 1 cent for each ounce or fraction of an ounce, the same as proposed in bill H. R. 7016.

All other parcel-post matter over 4 ounces but not exceeding 9 ounces

	Local	Present rates according to zones (cents)							Proposed rate, all zones (cents)
		1 and 2	3	4	5	6	7	8
5 ounces	5	5	6	7	8	9	11	12	5

Increase	4	4	3	2	1
Decrease							3	3
Per cent	80	80	50	29	13		18	25

The increase in postage on parcels of fourth-class or parcel-post matter subject to the pound rates as proposed by this bill for the various zones over the present parcel-post pound rates is set forth in the following tables:

First pound—Over 9 ounces

Zone	Present rate	Proposed rate	Increase	Per cent of increase
	Cents	Cents	Cents
Local	5	10	5	100
First	5	15	10	200
Second	5	15	10	200
Third	6	15	9	150
Fourth	7	15	8	114
Fifth	8	15	7	88
Sixth	9	15	6	67
Seventh	11	15	4	36
Eighth	12	15	3	25

Additional pound or fraction thereof

Zones	Present rate	Proposed rate	Increase	Per cent of increase
	Cents	Cents	Cents
Local	½	1	½	100
First	1	2	1	100
Second	1	3	2	200
Third	2	4	2	100
Fourth	4	5	1	25
Fifth	6	7	1	17
Sixth	8	9	1	13
Seventh	10	11	1	10
Eighth	12	13	1	8

Under H. R. 8437 the existing rate is retained for parcels weighing 8 ounces or less containing books, plants, seeds, bulbs, etc., while on all other fourth-class or parcel-post matter weighing 8 ounces or less 1 cent an ounce is proposed, larger parcels being subject to the present pound rates according to zones, plus a parcel fee of 5 cents on each parcel.

The same percentages of increases and decreases in the rates proposed in bill H. R. 8437 as compared with the present rate for parcels of fourth-class matter weighing 8 ounces or less, except books, plants, seeds, bulbs, etc., obtain as under the rates therefor in H. R. 7016, as set forth in the third table above. The charge of a 5-cent parcel fee on each parcel exceeding 8 ounces in weight would, in effect, be an increase of 5 cents on the initial pound on parcels sent to any zone, no increase over the present rate being contemplated for additional pounds or fractional parts thereof on parcels weighing over 1 pound.

Bill H. R. 8437 further provides that third and fourth class mail shall be consolidated into one class, to be designated as parcel-post mail. Under existing laws third-class matter includes miscellaneous printed matter (except books and newspapers and periodicals entered as second-class matter) and is subject to a flat rate of 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof regardless of distance or zone. The limit of weight for third-class matter is 4 pounds, parcels weighing more than 4 pounds now being included in the fourth class. It may be seen, therefore, that if third-class mail were merged with fourth-class mail, as proposed, a decrease would be effected in some cases where parcels of the former are sent to the near-by zones, while in other instances, particularly on parcels sent to the farther zones, the postage would be increased.

Any further information with respect to the foregoing you may desire will be gladly furnished.

Sincerely yours,

W. IRVING GLOVER,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

STATUS OF NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I desire to prefer a unanimous-consent request to insert in the RECORD a report just received by that committee from the Secretary of the Navy on the status of the Naval Establishment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, let me ask if that report has been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BRITTEN. No; it has not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has it been printed as a part of the proceedings of another body?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; it has no relation to the tables printed in to-day's RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the following letter of May 21, 1924, from the Secretary of the Navy occasionally refers to a letter of May 8, 1924, so it will be necessary to insert both for the benefit of the House.

[No. 177]

REPLY OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT TO CERTAIN QUESTIONS CONTAINED IN HOUSE RESOLUTION 286, AUTHORIZING AND DIRECTING THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY TO FURNISH THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES CERTAIN DATA ON THE NAVAL STRENGTH OF THE AMERICAN NAVY, ETC.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 21, 1924.

Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Referring to your letter of May 6, 1924, there is forwarded herewith the reply of this department to the questions brought up in House Resolution 286, of May 5, 1924.

Sincerely yours, CURTIS D. WILBUR, Secretary.

Question 1. Is it a fact that as a fighting unit the American Navy is to-day in third place among the navies of the world?

Answer. No. Plans have been prepared for the complete modernization of our battleships, as recommended in the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy, to cost $30,000,000. Authority for modernization of the six coal-burning battleships has been requested of the present Congress. The department asked authority of the present Congress to build eight 10,000-ton light cruisers; also for funds to build three mine-laying submarines.

As to the last sentence, it is difficult to definitely state our exact strength due to the varying ratios in the different types. A fair approximation may be obtained by study of the ratios for the various types in paragraph 3. A fair comparison of the present fighting strength in ships of Great Britain, America, and Japan would appear to be 5–4–3. This ratio does not take into consideration strategically located and well-equipped naval bases which add greatly to the sea power of a nation, nor does it take into consideration the relative strength of the various merchant marines.

The Navy is in good shape with the exception of the above designated deficiencies, which should be remedied. The morale of the personnel, both commissioned and enlisted, is high. The appropriations furnished by Congress are being applied in such manner as to obtain the very best results.

Question 2. Is it a fact that America leads the world in the theory and science of aviation and yet trails Great Britain, France, and Japan in aviation preparedness for national defense?

Answer. America is on an equality with Great Britain and France in theory and science of aviation.

The United States is equal or ahead of any nation in the number of planes suitable for use in naval aviation but is behind Great Britain in plane carriers. This will give a 5–4–3 ratio when the two plane carriers now under construction are completed.

The United States has done more operating of aircraft with the fleet than any other country, and while the number of aircraft is far from adequate, the present state of efficiency of naval aviation is believed to be as high as that in any navy.

Question 3. Is it a fact that the Navy has less than three months' supply of fuel oil in reserve storage and that other powers signatory to the Washington treaty have from one to three years' reserve storage?

Answer. The amount of fuel oils in reserve storage on March 31, 1924, would supply the fleet at the 1923 peace-consumption rate for three and one-tenth months.

The amount of fuel oil in current use tankage on same date would supply the fleet at the same rate of consumption for a period of three and two-tenths months. The total oil on hand March 31, 1924, would supply the Navy for six and three-tenths months at the present rate of consumption.

The total supply on hand on March 31, 1924, however, is less than 10 per cent of the requirements of the Navy for one year under war conditions.

Exact information as to the fuel-oil reserves of other powers can not be obtained. It is not believed that any nation has as much as a three-year reserve.

Question 4. What steps are necessary for an adequate reserve storage of fuel oil?

Answer. The approved policy of the Navy Department requires the provision of 48,059,200 barrels reserve storage for fuel oil and other petroleum products located at various strategic points. Of this there is now constructed tankage for 4,162,389 barrels.

To construct the remaining tankage (43,896,811 barrels) would take $71,955,000. If funds were made available, it could be constructed over a number of years to take care of royalty oil as produced, where oil can not be kept in the ground in our oil reserves.

Question 5. Is it a fact that Great Britain's 22 first-line battleships have superior speed, greater radius of action, better torpedo and aircraft attack protection, and longer gun-range facilities than have our 18 first-line ships?

Answer. See Navy Department's letter 3809–959 : 283 of May 8, 1924, to the charman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives.

It should be noted in addition that the radii of action of the United States battleship force and the British battleship force do not differ materially. In the newer ships the United States ships are believed to have an advantage, while in some older vessels the British are believed to have an advantage.

Question 6. What reconditioning and alteration is necessary in order to put all battleships at their highest efficiency, and where was each ship stationed on May 1, 1924?

Answer. (a) The modernization of the New York, Texas, Florida, Utah, Arkansas, and Wyoming, as previously recommended to Congress, comprising the provision of additional deck, torpedo, and mine protection, and conversion to oil burning, as provided for in H. R. 8687. These ships should also have some increased elevation of guns.

(b) The modernization of New Mexico, Mississippi, Idaho, Pennsylvania, Arizona, Nevada, and Oklahoma, including increasing angle of elevation of guns and additional torpedo protection.

(c) Various repairs and changes to the majority of ships, which can be made from the current appropriations when sufficient funds are made available.

The location and status of each ship on May 1, 1924, is indicated below:

Name	Location of, May 1, 1924
Arkansas	New York yard, fitting out for midshipman cruise.
Wyoming	Do
New York	Norfolk yard, fitting out for midshipman cruise.
Texas	Do.
Florida	North River, N. Y.
Utah	Tangier Sound.
California	San Pedro, target practice.
New Mexico	Do.
Pennsylvania	Do.
Nevada	Do.
Arizona	Do.
Idaho	Do.
Mississippi	Do.
Maryland	Do.
Tennessee	Do.
Oklahoma	Bremerton, annual overhaul.
Colorado	New York yard, fitting out.
West Virginia	Do.

Question 7. Is additional radio equipment necessary on ships, and if so, where and in what order should it be installed?

Answer. Additional radio equipment is necessary on certain ships of the fleet as replacements for obsolete equipment and to comply with communication requirements for modern warfare.

This modernization includes:

(1) Replacement of spark transmitters and arc transmitters with vacuum tube transmitters. This reduces interference, increases range, and permits of more economic operation. This has been partially accomplished in battleships.

(2) Provide for simultaneous transmission and reception by radio, by separating receivers and transmitters. This is necessary in order to permit rapidity in fire control and maneuvering signals without impairing communications regarding orders and information.

(3) Replace present obsolete receiving equipment with modern receivers. Modern receivers are essential in order to permit operation on several channels of communication without interference.

(4) The substitution of mechanical operation for manual operation in order to economize on personnel and in order to reduce the time now used for signals. Modern equipment should be installed in the following order:

1. Flagships.
2. Battleships.
3. Destroyers.
4. Cruisers.
5. Submarines.
6. Patrol vessels.
7. Auxiliaries.

The modernization plan above indicated has been prepared for some time and work thereon is proceeding as rapidly as appropriations permit. It is hoped that future appropriations may make it possible to work more rapidly.

Question 8. How does the American new construction program compare with that of other first-class powers?

Battleships

	Under construction or authorized	Date on which treaty allows first replacements of old battleships
Great Britain	[1] 2	1925
United States	0	1934
Japan	0	1934
France	0	1930

[1] These were agreed upon to balance the Colorado and the West Virginia, which were completed after the conference.

Cruisers building or authorized

	Number	Tons
Great Britain	9	[1] 84,600
United States	2	15,000
Japan	12	90,680
France	5	44,000

[1] Includes 5 provided in Navy estimates 1924–25.

United States requires 22 to equal Britain in tonnage. Navy Department is asking Congress this session for authority to build eight, as provided in H. R. 8687.

Destroyers building or authorized

	Number	Tons
Great Britain	4	[1] 6,200
United States	0	0
Japan	27	36,800
France	24	39,600

[1] 2 flotilla leaders and 2 destroyers, latter in Navy estimates 1924–25.

None asked for in United States Navy program, for we are far ahead in destroyers, though we lack destroyer leaders.

Submarines building or authorized

	Number	Tons
Great Britain	6	6,070
United States	11	[1] 13,519
Japan	37	41,165
France	23	20,100

[1] Six additional to these 11 were authorized in 1916, but construction held in abeyance; no appropriations.

Navy Department is asking Congress for funds to construct three mine-laying submarines of the six submarines already authorized. The appropriation bill as approved in conference carries the funds to commence one mine-laying submarine.

Aircraft carriers building or authorized

	Number	Tons
Great Britain	3	50,300
United States	2	66,000
Japan	2	53,900
France	1	24,830

Navy Department completing the two authorized above.

RIVER GUNBOATS

United States Navy program includes six small gunboats to replace old vessels in Chinese rivers; three were approved by Budget; Navy is asking Congress this session for six in all.

Japan completed four river gunboats in 1923.

Question 9. What auxiliary ships are necessary for a proper rounding out of the Battle Fleet?

Answer. The department assumes that this question refers to noncombatant auxiliaries. The approved policy of the Navy Department requires the construction of noncombatant auxiliaries enumerated in the table below to round out the fleet and to thoroughly prepare it to defend United States possessions.

Distilling ships	2
Destroyer tenders	2
Submarine tenders	5
Fleet repair ships	3
Aircraft tender	1
Mine layers, first line	10
Mine sweepers	20

A number of these could be taken over from the merchant marine and fitted out.

Question 10. Are American ships deficient in antiaircraft batteries and machine guns?

Answer. American ships are not deficient in antiaircraft batteries and machine guns when compared with the vessels of other navies. Improvement in these batteries is necessary. Considerable experimentation is going forward with this end in view. It is not desirable to replace the present batteries until a more satisfactory type of gun is developed. The problem is difficult and requires time and funds for development work.

Question 11. Have congressional appropriations been in accord with Navy Department and Budget Commission recommendations, and if not, wherein has Congress failed?

Answer. The Navy Department's estimates, as submitted to the Budget, have each year been considerably larger than the funds allowed by the Budget. Therefore, the congressional appropriations are not in accord with the Navy Department's recommendations. The congressional appropriations have, however, been substantially in accord with the recommendations of the Budget. There are certain minor reductions which Congress has made from the Budget figures, which need not be detailed. The important reductions for 1924 are:

Naval Reserve Force	$400,000
Engineering	325,000
Construction and repair	200,000
Ordnance and ordnance stores	479,000
Torpedoes and appliances	550,000
Fuel and transportation	500,000
Total 1924	2,454,000

The important reductions for 1925 are:

Bill in conference—Probable reductions

Improvements to channel and harbor, Pearl Harbor	$400,000
Relocating dry dock Dewey at Cavite	330,000
Two barrack buildings at San Diego, Calif	150,000
Elimination of provisions for beginning work on three submarines.
Torpedoes and appliances	350,000
Total 1925	1,230,000

Question 12. Is it a fact that airplane carriers authorized in July, 1922, are not 50 per cent completed and that at their present rate of construction will not be completed until 1928?

Answer. The various steps in the building of airplane carriers authorized in July, 1922, are listed as follows:

	Lexington	Saratoga
Keel laid for original battle cruiser design	January, 1921	September, 1920.
Authorized for alteration and completion as airplane carrier.	July, 1922	July, 1922.
Present percentage of completion	47.6	44.6.
Probable date of completion	July, 1926	July, 1926.

Question 13. What steps are necessary for the promotion of proper naval aircraft to support the Battle Fleet?

Answer. Increase appropriation for naval aviation in order to keep up with the rapid and progressive development of this arm of the service and to insure the fleet being fully supplied with the most modern types of this important weapon.

Question 14. Is it a fact that we have not a single submarine capable of maneuvering with the fleet, and further, that our submarines are obsolete before their construction is completed?

Answer. We have no submarines capable of maneuvering with the fleet at battle speed nor at the usual fleet-cruising speed under all conditions of sea and weather. We have nearly completed the V 1, 2, and 3, which will be able to keep up with the fleet. Our submarines, for the purpose for which they are designed, are not obsolete before their construction is completed. With the exception of the T class, they were not designed for maneuvering with the fleet and, within the limits of the purpose for which they were designed, are reasonably efficient and reliable.

Question 15. Is it a fact that our submarine engines do not compare in efficiency with those manufactured in Europe?

Answer. The Bureau of Engineering is now building submarine engines that are identical with the best now manufactured in Europe. Four of our submarines are equipped with these engines. In all remaining submarines the engines are not equal to best present European manufacture. In general, however, our submarines compare favorably with the corresponding units in the other navies.

Question 16. Is it a fact that we have but three fleet submarines in the Navy (built in 1920 and 1921) and that they already are out of commission?

Answer. Yes. This class (three ships, the T boats above referred to) was designed in 1914 and finished in 1920–21. They have proved to be unsatisfactory, as the tandem-type engine has failed to give the performance expected. They are out of commission. As stated in the answer to question 14 of this paper, we have, however, three building which will keep up with the fleet.

Question 17. Is it a fact that three fleet submarines authorized six years ago are but 60 per cent completed, and at present rate of construction in a Government yard will not be commissioned until 1928?

Answer. The steps in the building of these three fleet submarines are listed as follows:

	V-1	V-2	V-3
Authorized	July, 1918	July, 1918	July, 1918.
Keel laid [1]	October, 1921	October, 1921	November, 1921.
Percentage of completion (May 10, 1924).	71.5	58.8	51.4.
Probable date of completion	January, 1925	July, 1925	December, 1925.

[1] At the time the construction of these vessels was authorized, the Navy Department was engaged in the building of a large number of smaller submarines which were urgently needed for war service, and it was considered inadvisable to divert building facilities to the construction of vessels which could probably not be completed in time to be of use in the war. After the signing of the armistice, the Navy Department decided to defer the preparation of the plans for these vessels until such time as full information could be obtained relative to the designs of British and German submarines and their experience in the war.

Question 18. What is the present condition of each of our submarines, and where were they stationed on May 1, 1924?

Answer. H, K, and N classes—19 submarines. General reliability excellent; would be very useful in time of war for training purposes and for coast patrol. Out of commission to furnish personnel for S boats.

L class—eight submarines. Four of these recently reengined with satisfactory engines. The other four not considered sufficiently reliable to meet the latest requirements of coastwise work and will probably be sold. Out of commission to furnish personnel for S boats.

O and R classes—43 submarines. Thirty of these are satisfactory and their reliability excellent, both surface and submerged. The other 13, while not so good, are creditable enough to be retained in commission. Two of these have recently had damages to their hulls which will require extensive repairs to place them in commission.

These submarines are of great military value to the United States in defense of outlying stations, and are assigned to the Canal Zone and Pearl Harbor.

S class—50 submarines. These vessels were designed for independent operation of a gentral nature, similar to the U–110 class, are practically 1,000 tons, with a radius of 4,000 miles. These boats were authorized in 1916. The last will be completed this year, and all will then be in commission; 41 are in fair to good condition. The material condition of nine is such as to require extensive repair to put in good condition. They were built with a 7-inch crank shaft, which was not satisfactory, and the contractors substituted 8-inch shafts, which had originally been planned for the boats by the department. The Bureau of Engineering expects that the new crank shaft will eliminate further crank-shaft trouble. Thus far they have been satisfactory.

T class—three submarines. Designed in 1914 and finished in 1920 and 1921; were not satisfactory, as the tandem type of engine has failed to give the performance expected. Out of commission; unsatisfactory.

V class—three submarines. These boats now under construction, 50 to 70 per cent completed.

Question 19. Is the United States in third place in submarine strength?

Answer. See statement in paragraph 3 concerning submarines in the department's letter 3809–959–283 of May 8, 1924, to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SUBMARINES

Built and building, 485 tons and over, tonnage ratio is—

Great Britain	4.7
United States	7.6
Japan	7.3

Question 20. What steps are necessary to insure the construction of submarines that will function in accordance with specification requirements?

Answer. Continue present efforts to develop an improved Diesel engine which will meet latest submarine requirements, and continue progressive tests with the fleet. A type engine is now being tested at the navy yard, New York.

Question 21. Is it a fact that the United States ranks third in the number of light cruisers in commission?

Answer. Yes. See paragraphs 3 and 11 of the Department's letter 3809–959–283 of April 29, 1924, to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

CRUISERS

Cruisers built, building, or authorized since 1912 compared in ratio of the number of cruisers—

Great Britain	5
United States	1
Japan	3

And compared in tonnage ratio—

Great Britain	5
United States	1.5
Japan	3

LIGHT CRUISERS

Ships necessary to build to bring up to 5-5-3 ratio in displacement tonnage in addition to ships now built, building, or appropriated for:

	Number of ships	Tonnage
United States	[1] 21 [2] 22	[2] 210,000
Great Britain	None.	None.
Japan	None.	None.

[1] 10,000 tons.
[2] On basis of present Japanese tonnage.
[3] On basis of British tonnage, including 5 new ones in 1925 British estimates.

(This table shows that at the present date (April 8, 1924) we require twenty-one 10,000-ton cruisers to obtain a 5–5–3 ratio with Japan and need twenty-two 10,000-ton cruisers to obtain an equality or 5–5 ratio with England (on tonnage basis). As these ships would be larger and more modern than the majority of the corresponding units in the British and Japanese Navies this would give us a preponderance in cruiser strength if all were completed as of to-day. All nations, however, have cruiser-building programs, and this Nation should map out a program for the future with the end outlined above in view.)

Question 22. Are destroyer tenders in bad repair?

Answer. In general; no. The Dencbola, because of state of repair and as conversion to tender was not entirely completed, has been withdrawn from service in order to commission the new Dobbin. Melville (Battle Fleet) at next overhaul will be fitted with new furnace burners; otherwise good repair. Altair (Battle Fleet), conversion to tender nearly completed; good repair. Rigel (Battle Fleet), destroyer base tender; good repair. Bridgeport (Scouting Fleet) will eventually be relieved by the new Whitney; is a coal burner; good repair. Black Hawk (Asiatic Fleet), good repair.

[NOTE. All destroyer tenders now in commission are too slow, but compare favorably with those of the other great naval powers.]

Question 23. Is a proper surplus of mines and torpedoes being maintained?

Answer. A proper surplus of mines of the most modern type is now maintained. The surplus of torpedoes prescribed by the General Board is not maintained. The Navy Department has approximately 80 per cent of the number of torpedoes required and effort has been made for several years to fill existing deficiencies, but appropriations for this purpose have been insufficient to permit the reserve supply to be built up to the amount required by the plans of the General Board.

Question 24. How many additional mine sweepers are necessary?

Answer. The department's approved policy would require 20 additional mine sweepers, which would be met in time of war by taking over and fitting out ocean-going tugs.

Question 25. Is America in third place in the matter of naval bases in the Pacific?

Answer. In the western Pacific, yes; in third place. In the eastern Pacific, no; in first place.

Question 26. What is the most important naval-base requirement?

Answer. The most important base development on shore is the completion of the Pearl Harbor base development project.

Question 27. Have recent fleet maneuvers indicated that our ships are properly manned with an enlisted personnel of 86,000?

Answer. It has not been practicable to keep in commission the desired number of vessels of required types because of an insufficient allowed personnel. It is for this reason that we have laid up so many destroyers which could be profitably engaged in fleet maneuvers. The ships in commission can be manned with only 90 to 95 per cent of their required complements.

COMMENTS ON ARTICLE IN THE NEW YORK TIMES OF APRIL 28, 1924, QUOTING MR. W. B. SHEARER

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 8, 1924.

Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In reply to your letter of April 29, 1924, I am forwarding herewith a statement concerning the article by Mr. Shearer which appeared in the New York Times April 28.

I trust that this statement will fully cover the information which you have requested.

Sincerely yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, Acting.

In the following pages Mr. Shearer's statements are placed in quotation marks. These are followed by the department's comments.

1. "Navy out of date."

In the items enumerated below, either the latest modern practice is not incorporated or the latest equipment or latest types of ships are not provided.

(a) Gun range of 13 battleships.
(b) Deck protection of 6 battleships.
(c) Underwater protection of 13 battleships.
(d) Kind of fuel on 6 battleships (oil).
(e) Submarine: No mine-laying or cruiser types.
(f) Cruisers: Shortage in numbers.
(g) Destroyer leaders: None.
(h) Fuel economy: Lack of certain up-to-date engineering equipment; between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000 being considered in Congress now.
(i) Material readiness of ships out of commission: Especially destroyers and submarines.
(j) Auxiliary ships: Speed and radius limited in certain auxiliary ships converted from merchant marine.

2. "Did not profit by lessons of war and is now outclassed."

We have profited by the lessons of the war and have in many cases given them effect. But there are other directions in which improvement has had to wait upon appropriations. (See paragraph 1, (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), above.)

3. "'Not only have we neglected the Navy so that the 5-5-3 treaty ratio is actually 5-3-1, with America 1,' Mr. Shearer said, 'but we have failed to modernize the fleet as well. That is in marked contrast with the British and the Japanese. They learned the lessons of the war. We paid no attention to them.'" * * *

(1) The positive statement that America is 1 in relation to Great Britain and Japan is not correct. It is impossible to make a mathematical ratio of naval strengths that will cover all factors. About the best we can truly say is that if 5 and 3 represent the present fighting strengths of Great Britain and Japan, respectively, then the United States would appear to be approximately 4.

The ratio in the various types of ships is given below:

BATTLESHIPS

The battleships Florida, Utah, Wyoming, and Arkansas required boiler repairs in order to maintain their speed. Until this could be done the speed of these four ships was reduced and they had to drop out of the battle line. This reduced the ratio to 5–4–3.

All of these ships can now maintain their speed except the Florida, which would be able to make her speed after reconditioning.

The Navy Department has asked for funds to recondition these six oldest battleships and to give them new boilers for oil burning, because the life of these boilers has about reached the limit.

CRUISERS

Cruisers built, building, or authorized since 1912 compared in ratio of the number of cruisers—

Great Britain	5
United States	1
Japan	3

And compared in tonnage ratio—

Great Britain	5
United States	1.5
Japan	3

DESTROYERS

Comparing number of destroyers in commission with full or reduced crews as of October 1, 1923—

Great Britain	196
United States	109
Japan	63

Or ratio of about—

Great Britain	5
United States	3
Japan	1.5

Comparing actual numbers of first-line effective destroyers in and out of commission—

Great Britain	201
United States	283
Japan	92

Or ratio of 5–7–2.

SUBMARINES

Built and building, 485 tons and over, tonnage ratio is—

Great Britain	4.7
United States	7.6
Japan	7.3

AIRCRAFT CARRIERS

Built and building on tonnage basis—

Great Britain	5
United States	4
Japan	3

(2) For the positive statement that we have paid no attention to the lessons of the war, this is not correct. We have paid attention to these lessons, but it has not been practicable to apply them in several important particulars. (See par. 1, (b), (c), (d), (e), (f).)

4. "Perhaps the greatest lesson of the war was the effectiveness of the torpedo. Until 1914 no one in or out of the Navy dreamed of the power of the torpedo. No one dreamed it was a weapon of such importance that upon it might hang the success or failure not only of naval units but of military units as well. Within a month after the outbreak of hostilities, however, the torpedo had become one of the chief weapons of naval warfare. That came about when three British cruisers, the Hogue, the Cressey, and the Aboukir, were sunk in the North Sea."

This statement is controversial. The effectiveness of the torpedo as the greatest lesson of the war is open to doubt. It had great effect.

The last sentence is approximately correct.

5. "Efficacy of 'blistering.'"

"It was not long before the torpedo had made the seas unsafe for capital ships and the British turned around for some method of protection for their battleships. They decided to 'blister' them.

"Now a blister is, roughly speaking, an outside hull, put on both sides of the vessel below the water line, for it is below the water line that the torpedo strikes. They blistered such of their ships as they could during the war. They have blistered them all since the war.

"They have done more than give protection to the ship, however, in this process of blistering. They have utilized that space inside the blister to carry reserve oil. This not only adds to the protection and adds to the displacement of the ship, but it increases cruising radius up to perhaps 23,000 miles. Curiously the blister also adds to the speed of the ship."

First paragraph is correct, in so far as regards the British adopting blisters to minimize the effects of torpedo hits.

Second paragraph is correct, except for the last sentence. As far as our information goes, when the Rodney and Nelson are completed the British will have equipped 10 of their 20 battleships with blisters or their equivalent. England has 10 battleships that will need blisters. The United States has 5 ships of their 18 fitted with the equivalent of blisters and has 13 ships that need blisters.

Third paragraph. There is no reliable data on the points brought out in this paragraph. Blisters do add to the displacement of ships, but they decrease the speed. Oil carried inside a blister will give some protection.

6. "Japan is also blistering her big ships. She is to spend 50,000,000 yen for modernization of nine ships, and much of it is to go for this work of blistering. Her ships of the Fuso class are to be blistered. That means they will have protection against torpedo attack; they will have so much more reserve fuel oil and their cruising radius will run up to 23,000 miles.

"We have done nothing. None of our ships are blistered. None are to be blistered. The Navy wants it done, but what the Navy wants and what Congress gives it are two different things."

First paragraph. It is not definitely known what Japan is doing with regard to blisters. It is true that Japan intends to spend 50,000,000 yen for modernizing ships. But nothing definitely is known how this money will be spent. Press reports state that the Japanese ships are to be converted to oil burners and given increased deck protection.

Second paragraph. Statements as to blisters on the United States ships are incorrect. United States has 5 ships with equivalent of blisters and 13 ships that need them.

7. "Neglected lessons of war.

"We have not only failed to modernize our ships by blistering them but we have failed to learn the lesson of deck armor as well. Nowadays the angle of fire is so high and bombing so feasible that the vitals of a ship are unduly exposed to attack. These vitals are the machinery, fuel, and ammunition. To protect them the British have built as many as three armored decks. The Nelson, Hood, and Rodney have armored decks, and it is entirely probable that the two ships of the Renown class, the Tiger, the five Royal Sovereigns, and the five Queen Elizabeths also have three armored decks."

Twelve of our eighteen ships compare favorably with Japanese and British ships as regards deck protection. The remaining six ships have insufficient deck protection. The British provided some additional deck protection as a result of Jutland. Nothing definite is known of the Japanese in this respect. Second and third sentences are correct.

8. "The Japanese, too, have modernized their ships in this respect. Two of Japan's capital ships have three decks of armor; two others have two decks. We, however, have only one deck armored as protection against the long-range gun and the aerial bomb."

Nothing definite is known as regards the Japanese in this respect. (See comment under paragraph 7.)

9. "Even if we were on equal terms we could be destroyed by our failure to provide sufficient armored decks. But we are not even on equal gun terms. The average range of the 22 British ships is 24,967 yards, practically 25,000 yards; while the average range of our capital ships is 23,333 yards. We could be blown out of the water by the British without even hitting the target. They could stand off out of range and do it.

"Marked deficiency in speed.

"It is true that we have five ships of equal range with the British. These are the two ships of the California class and the three ships of the Colorado class. They have a range of 30,000 yards and they would have to do all the fighting, because every other ship in the British Navy—19 of them—outrange every other ship in the American Navy. And that is not all. While the California and the Colorado ships have the same range as the Hood and the two Rodneys, those ships could sail circles around ours, for the Hood makes 31 knots and the two Rodneys make 30. Against this none of our ships can do better than 21."

First paragraph. As to our needs in armored decks, see paragraph 7. As to equal gun terms the facts are: We have 5 ships which are superior in range to 18 British ships. These 5 are about equal in range to 2 new British ships (Rodney and Nelson, under construction).

The British capital-ship fleet enjoys a very marked superiority in the number of ships that may be brought into action at the moderate and decisive ranges between 21,000 and 24,000 yards. This superiority is shown in the following table:

Range, in yards	British ships in action	American ships in action
24,000	13	10
23,000	20	10
22,000	20	12
21,000	20	18

The statement as to average gun ranges means nothing, as a few ships with extreme ranges are averaged in with a greater number of ships with low ranges. The figures above give more information.

As to speed, the British have five battleships that make 4 knots greater speed than the fastest American battleship, and four battle cruisers than can make from 9 to 10½ knots greater speed than the fastest American battleship. Our lack of battle cruisers of high speeds is because we have deemed it more prudent to place the money available in the more powerful battleships with less speed and heavier armor, hence greater vitality.

Mr. Shearer gives a table of ranges as follows:

British

Class	Number of ships	Speed	Caliber of guns	Range
			Inches
Tiger	1	30	13.5	23,800
Iron Duke	4	22	13.5	23,800
Renown	2	30	15	24,300
Royal Sovereign	5	21	15	24,300
Queen Elizabeth	5	21	15	24,300
Glorius	2	30	15	24,300
Hood	1	31	15	30,000
Rodney	2	30	16	30,000

United States

Class	Number of ships	Speed	Caliber of guns	Range
			Inches
Utah	2	21	12	20,000
Wyoming	2	21	12	22,000
Texas, Arizona, and Nevada	6	21	12	20,000
New Mexico	3	21	14	22,000
California	2	21	14	30,000
Colorado	3	21	16	30,000

"WOULD BLOW US OUT OF THE WATER

"You can see by those figures, * * * that it would be 5 ships against 22. They would blow us out of the water.

"Then consider the element of speed. The Hood makes 31 knots; the two Rodneys, the two Glorious class, the two Renowns, and the Tiger make 30; the five Queen Elizabeths make 25. In other words, one makes 31 knots, seven make 30 knots, and five make 25 knots. Against that what have we? Not one of our eighteen ships can make better than 21 knots. What is more, the British engines are built to make a knot or two more than their designed speed. Our ships are not. In fact, when they don't come up to the designed speed in their trials, Congress helps the contractors out and accepts them anyway. The shameful thing about it is that, while our eighteen capital ships have designed speed of 21 knots, four can do only 16 knots, and six can not make more than 12 knots. On paper the Pennsylvania, the Arizona, the Oklahoma, and the Nevada make 21 knots; actually they can do only 16. On paper the New York, the Texas, the Utah, the Wyoming, the Arkansas, and the Florida can make 21 knots; actually they are all coal burners and can make only 12 knots."

The above tables are incorrect in many places as to ranges. For comparison of ranges see statement under paragraph 9 above. The statements as to speed of four United States ships being reduced to 16 knots and six ships reduced to 12 knots are not correct. The speeds are as indicated below:

British

Class	Number of ships	Speed
Tiger	1
Iron Duke	4	21
Renown	2	31.5
Royal Sovereign	5	23
Queen Elizabeth	5	25
Hood	1	31

[1] Last full power runs.
[2] Trial speed.
[3] Estimated when repairs are completed.
[4] Present speed. Awaiting funds for new boilers.

The statement that the British engines are built to make a knot or two more than their designed speed is not confirmed by our information.

All of our ships at present can make their designed speeds, or practically so, except the Utah, Arkansas, Wyoming, and Florida. The boilers of these ships have through long use become deteriorated. They have recently been sent to navy yards to undergo repairs, which will be completed, except for the Florida, by July 1, 1924. These repairs place these vessels again in the battle line for a time.

The following record of time spent by them in navy yards for repairs during the last two fiscal years is indicative of their condition:

Calendar days at yard for repairs

Ship	1922	1923	Total
Florida	49	267	316
Utah (abroad)	None.	126	126
Wyoming	110	109	219
Arkansas	110	193	303

The Florida can make now only 12 knots. Her repairs are held up pending the decision of Congress relative to her modernization.

The complete reconditioning of these four vessels is essential.

11. "Far below treaty strength.

"'Now, consider the light cruiser situation. The British are five to one better than us, and the Japanese two and one-half to one. An official memorandum of the Navy Department shows that the three navies stand this way:

Light cruisers necessary to bring up to 5–5–3 ratio

	Number of ships	Tonnage
United States	10	187,883
British Empire	7	72,093
Japan	None.	None.

"'That table shows that the Japanese are up to strength and we are 19 ships below strength. The Navy Department knows it can not get 19 fast light cruisers, however, so it has asked for 8. It expects to get none.

"'Back in 1916 we authorized 10 cruisers. That was the year before we entered the war. Of those 10, 7 have been built; 3 have not yet been completed, and before they are launched they are out of date. It is just that sort of thing that has turned the 5–5–3 ratio into a 5–3–1 ratio, with America 1.'"

For a comparison of cruiser ratio see comment under paragraph 3, page 3.

On the basis of comparing the displacement tonnage of light cruisers less than 12 years old and of 25 knots or greater speed Mr. Shearer's table is incorrect. It should read as follows:

LIGHT CRUISERS

Ships necessary to build to bring up to 5–5–3 ratio in displacement tonnage in addition to ships now built, building, or appropriated for:

	Number of ships	Tonnage
United States	[1]21 [2]22	[2]210,000
Great Britain	None.	None.
Japan	None.	None.

[1] 10,000 tons.
[2] On basis of present Japanese tonnage.
[3] On basis of British tonnage, including 5 new ones in 1925 British estimates.

This table shows that at the present date (April 8, 1924), we require twenty-one 10,000-ton cruisers to obtain a 5–5–5 ratio with Japan and need twenty-two 10,000-ton cruisers to obtain an equality or 5–5 ratio with England (on tonnage basis). As these ships would be larger and more modern than the majority of the corresponding units in the British and Japanese Navies, this would give us a preponderance in cruiser strength if all were completed as of to-day. All nations, however, have cruiser-building programs, and this Nation should map out a program for the future, with the end outlined above in view.

12. "Now consider the destroyer situation. The British have 170 destroyers in service. The Japanese have 69 destroyers in service. We have 107 or 108 destroyers in service. The rest of our destroyers, some 225 or 230 of them, are tied up, hull to hull, and bow to stern, in Philadelphia and other places, just like the Shipping Board vessels you can see up the Hudson, and you know what is happening to their machinery all this time."

For the comparative situation as to destroyers, as of data obtainable on October 1, 1923, see paragraph 3, page 3.

13. "Personnel drops off.

"'To illustrate the condition of the destroyer fleet let me go back to just after the war. We had a great number of destroyers at Newport then. It was announced that they would be taken to Charleston, S. C., for winter quarters. Do you know how that was done? Six officers and about 40 men boarded a destroyer and made a daylight run to Charleston. Then they tied her up, came back by train and took another destroyer down. That is how the entire lot was moved, but the public never knew it.

"'And the reason for this is that we have let our personnel drop off.'"

This method of moving destroyers was employed because there was not sufficient personnel to man all of them. Whether or not the exact number of men stated took destroyers from Newport to Charleston just after the war in the manner stated is not known.

14. "In personnel we are nowhere near the 5–5–3 figures. We have 7,500 officers and 86,000 men; we should have 12,585 officers and 97,125 men. The British are practically up to strength and the Japanese are up to strength with 7,550 officers and 58,274 men."

The situation as to personnel is as follows:

	Great Britain	United States	Japan
Active Navy:
Enlisted men	91,397	86,000	58,274
Officers	8,571	7,821	7,550
Enrolled reserves and retired Navy:
Enlisted men	62,626	24,173	[1] 31,419
Officers	9,843	6,193

[1] Total officers and men.

As to Mr. Shearer's statement as to the number of men we should have, the Navy Department has frequently recommended to Congress the numbers necessary to carry out our plans and to maintain our policies.

15. "We have no bases of operations and virtually no fuel oil in reserve. Actually all the fuel oil stored above current needs is 1,500,000 barrels at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. Our Navy uses about 8,000,000 barrels a year, and in war we use about 40,000,000 barrels. And all we have is an infinitesimal amount at a point 2,100 miles off our shores."

This statement is not strictly correct. We have no operating bases in the Pacific that are adequate. The Atlantic bases are better, but are not nearly all adequate. As regards petroleum reserves, we have a deficiency of 68 per cent in the reserves required in the Pacific, i. e., 32 per cent only of the necessary reserves is on hand. The Atlantic reserve deficiencies are still greater. The reserve at Oahu on January 1, 1924, was about 1,759,667 barrels. In a Pacific war the Navy will use about 70,000,000 barrels during the first year of war.

16. "Fleet in poor condition.

"'Finally, the fleet is in poor condition. Congress has failed to provide funds to keep it in shape. The Atlantic Fleet is practically out of commission. The recent maneuvers had to be broken off because the Wyoming (flagship), Arkansas, Utah, and Florida needed to undergo repairs. They are tied up now. Their boilers are in bad shape and there is no money to do the work.'"

It is a fact that the matériel of the fleet is generally deteriorating, due to age and lack of funds to make all current repairs required. The bill as reported to the House this year carried an increase in the appropriation under engineering, to be applied to remedy in part this deficiency. Also the bill reported by the House Naval Affairs Committee authorizing certain modernization in the older battleships has this end in view.

17. "So that the situation is just this: Not only are we outgunned and outmanned, as I pointed out in yesterday's article, but we have failed to modernize our ships as well. England and Japan have blistered their battleships. That means they have given them further protection against torpedo attack, added to their fuel capacity, and greatly increased their cruising radius. We have done nothing."

These statements have been commented upon, separately, in the foregoing paragraphs. As to the last sentence, authority for the modernization of six battleships has been asked for in this Congress. The Secretary of the Navy in his annual report for 1923 recommended an appropriation of $30,000,000 for complete modernization of battleships.

18. "England outranges us 2 miles. When the Japanese have finished elevating their guns they will in some classes outrange us 5 miles. England has provided adequate deck armor against long-range guns and aerial bombs. We have done practically nothing."

See comments on paragraphs 7 and 9.

19. "Japan is up to the treaty's equivalent standard on light cruisers, England nearly so, while we are far behind, and those that we are building are out of date before they are launched."

See comparisons of cruisers, page 3.

20. "Japan is up to the treaty's equivalent standard in destroyers, England is behind but better than we, and we have two-thirds of our destroyers tied up and falling to pieces."

England has 196 destroyers manned with full or reduced crews, the United States has 109, and Japan 63. For comparison as to total number and ratios see page 3.

21. "In personnel Japan is right up to strength, to the last officer and the last man; England is nearly up to strength, while we are 5,085 officers and 18,525 men under strength. Actually it is more than that, because our Navy, besides being a fighting force, has to maintain a thousand and one things, from a radio communications service to looking after lepers."

See comment on paragraph 14.

22. "It all shapes up this way: We have scrapped our ships, we have scrapped our treaty, and we have failed to modernize. The naval ratio to-day instead of being 5–5–3 is 5–5–1 and we are 1."

This statement is greatly exaggerated. Plans have been prepared for the complete modernization of our battleships, as recommended in the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Navy, to cost $30,000,000. Authority for modernization of the six coal-burning battleships has been requested of the present Congress. The department asked authority of the present Congress to build eight 10,000-ton light cruisers; also for funds to build three mine-laying submarines.

As to the last sentence, it is difficult to definitely state our exact strength due to the varying ratios in the different types. A fair approximation may be obtained by study of the ratios for the various types in paragraph 3. A fair comparison of the present fighting strength in ships of Great Britain, America, and Japan would appear to be 5–4–3. This ratio does not take into consideration strategically located and well-equipped naval bases, which add greatly to the sea power of a nation; nor does it take into consideration the relative strength of the various merchant marines.

The Navy is in good shape with the exception of the above-designated deficiencies, which should be remedied. The morale of the personnel, both commissioned and enlisted, is high. The appropriations furnished by Congress are being applied in such manner as to obtain the very best results.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRITTEN. I desire to say to the House that this report from the Secretary of the Navy shows the Naval Establishment to be in a deplorable condition, irrespective of what has been said by others. The Secretary of the Navy himself admits many deficiencies, and the reason for the Committee on Naval Affairs directing me to submit this unanimous-consent request is that the House may be informed on the true status of the Naval Establishment. On next Wednesday legislation will probably be presented to the House to remedy some of these defects and to put our Navy at least in a 5–4–3 status and not a 5–3–2 status with the United States as the 2 end, which it now may be.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Would the gentleman mind putting in the RECORD at the same time the amount of money spent in the last three years on the different navies of the world whereby ours has come to occupy the relation of 5–3–2 and yet we have spent more money than any of the others? Will the gentleman explain why that is?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I will be glad to put that information in the RECORD. The truth of the matter is that both England and Japan are spending much more money relatively, per annum, than we are, and particularly on aviation for the Navy.

In the past two years we have appropriated $14,647,000 and $15,150,000, respectively, for naval aviation, while England in the past three years, on aviation alone (England having a combined Royal Air Force), spent £10,895,000 in 1923; £12,000,000 in 1924; and is authorizing £14,511,000 for the year 1925, which is almost five times what we are appropriating for the Navy.

My good friend from Texas has an idea that we are spending proportionately more than other countries on our Navy. Let me give him the following figures:

United States

1922	$416,574,437
1923	284,054,767
1924	320,204,550
1925	288,151,050

Great Britain

1923	$314,000,000
1924	280,000,000
1925	270,000,000

Japan	Yens
1922	483, 589, 712
1923	397, 406, 782
1924	278, 692, 422
1925	238, 000, 000

Mr. Speaker, the United States figures do not include the Marine Corps appropriations because neither Great Britain nor Japan have that kind of a service attached to their Navy. Marines in the British Navy are seamen like our Navy enlisted man.

In arriving at the figures for Great Britain I have figured the British pound sterling at approximately $4.85.

A glance at these figures will immediately impress one with the economy attempted in our appropriations, where I fear that the cuts have been too severe.

In the year 1921 we appropriated $664,000,000 for our Navy and have been reducing this amount very heavily each succeeding year, even below the lowest figures of the Director of the Budget.

In the bill which has just passed the House we cut the Navy $1,330,000 below the Budget figures, and in last year's bill we cut it $2,454,000.

When one realizes that the Japanese yen has a much greater actual purchasing power than the dollar, it is quite evident that Japan is doing more for her navy than we are for ours.

From fifteen to twenty million dollars a year should be added to the figures of Great Britain for naval aviation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not believe this day should be taken away from consideration of the proposed farm-relief legislation, and I shall have to object. Wednesday will be time enough.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to modify my request. After consultation with the leader of the minority, I ask unanimous consent to fix Wednesday instead of Thursday for the consideration of claims.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, Wednesday is calendar day, and we will be busy here all day, and I object.

I withdraw my objection at the request of the minority leader.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE TO-MORROW

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates to preside to-morrow at the memorial services of Hon. JOHN R. TYSON, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. ALMON.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 9429) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee reserved all points of order.

TO AMEND THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT OF JUNE 3, 1916

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2169) to amend in certain particulars the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 6 and 11.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 12, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the language proposed to be inserted by the House and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"SEC. 2. Add at the end of section 4c of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, the following: 'When in his judgment efficiency demands such action, the President is authorized to except officers of the Medical Corps, Ordnance Department, and Chemical Warfare Service from the provisions of this section requiring duty with troops of one or more of the combatant arms. The President is further authorized to except from the provisions of this section requiring duty with troops of one or more of the combatant arms such officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department as are now engaged in patent litigation in which the Government is involved.'"

And the House agree to the same.

JOHN C. McKENZIE,
HARRY E. HULL,
PERCY E. QUIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
RALPH H. CAMERON,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to occupy any of the time of the House in the discussion of this conference report further than to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, General SPEAKS, who feels that a mistake was made in striking out one amendment. After the conclusion of his remarks I will move the previous question.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was up on the 14th of May I offered the following amendment:

Amendment by Mr. SPEAKS: Page 11, line 15, after the period add the following: That section 9 of the act of June 10, 1922, is hereby amended by adding at the end of said section the following:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized in execution of the preceding provision to fix the pay grades hereunder of all enlisted men of the Army, retired prior to the inception on July 1, 1920, of the operation of section 4 (b) of the national defense act as amended."

I said in explanation of that amendment:

Mr. Speaker, this amendment is offered with the consent of the chairman of the committee. The language is that of the War Department. The amendment in no wise affects any commissioned officer of the Army. It relates solely to enlisted men of the Army with 30 years of service, upon which they retired. When the pay bill was enacted the language in one particular was such that the comptroller held that these men could not occupy a classification which it had been intended they should have.

The language of this bill simply authorizes the Secretary of War to so classify.

Now, I might add that the men affected are all old soldiers who enlisted in the Army 40 or 50 years ago at $13 a month. After serving in the ranks at $13 for some time they would be promoted to the grade of corporal with slight increase in pay, and after six or eight years in the grade of corporal they would be elevated to a sergeancy, and probably spend many years in this position. They were encouraged to remain in the Army with the hope that continuous service and an excellent record might enable them to attain the rank of post noncommissioned officer. The old fellows have been retired, and always after 30 years of uninterrupted and efficient service. When the pay bill was enacted in 1922 on the claim that all officers, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted men were entitled to increased compensation, these old men were given consideration, and the bill enacted July 1, 1922, provided that retired enlisted men of the Army and Marine Corps shall have their retired pay computed as now authorized by law on the basis of pay provided in this act; that is, the bill you were then enacting.

It was clearly the intention of Congress in revising the entire pay schedule that these faithful old enlisted men should be recognized and included in the benefits conferred by its provisions. The object of this amendment is merely to clarify the language so that the comptroller will find no occasion for questioning its meaning and withholding the increased pay intended by Congress. I ask the House to defer approval of this conference report until I have an opportunity to present the matter, because I feel that the committee action results, in part at least, from a misunderstanding of the facts. I have reason to believe that if opportunity is granted to take the report up with the committee the matter can be made satisfactory to everybody and thus prevent doing an injustice to anyone. Therefore I ask the House not to vote upon this conference report.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Will the gentleman tell me whether or not this bill will readjust the compensation of these soldiers after they have been retired?

Mr. SPEAKS. Yes. That was the intention of the law.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. It does not adjust their compensation while they are alive?

Mr. SPEAKS. Oh, they are living. It is now that we want the intention of Congress carried out, so that these faithful old veterans may receive the benefits granted by an appreciative and generous people.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I think that is hardly in keeping with the presidential program, is it?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, just a word. I am not certain, but I am rather inclined to believe that there is some merit in the contention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS], but the conferees felt that it is a matter that is too involved to include in this bill without further consideration and investigation. Therefore they excluded it.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKS. This amendment was offered at the only place in that bill or any other bill pending where it would be entirely germane, the place being not only appropriate but it seemed to be the exact place it should be offered.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SPEAKS) there were—ayes 119, noes 21.

So the conference report was agreed to.

M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9033) declaring an emergency in respect of certain agricultural commodities, to promote equality between agricultural commodities and other commodities, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9033, with Mr. SANDERS of Indiana in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

TITLE I.—AGRICULTURAL EXPORT CORPORATION

PART 1.—EMERGENCIES

GENERAL EMERGENCY

SECTION 1. (a) It is hereby declared that there exists a general emergency in respect of agricultural commodities by reason of—

(1) The continued economic depression in agriculture.

(2) Inequalities in prices between agricultural commodities and other commodities, resulting in a relatively inadequate return to the farmer for his labor and upon his investment.

(3) The existence of surpluses available for export in agricultural commodities.

(4) The necessity in part for the existence of such surpluses in order to safeguard the domestic market against uncertainties of yield, and the economic impracticability of immediately preventing the continued production of such surpluses.

(5) The dependence of the prices of such surplus commodities upon the lower prices in foreign markets due to unsettled world conditions and lower costs of production.

(b) The President shall by proclamation terminate the emergency declared by this section whenever the corporation (created in section 21) determines that the emergency conditions have ceased to exist or are no longer controlling; but in no event shall the emergency be held to exist later than five years from June 30 next following the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the section just read and insert the following matter, with notice that if the motion prevails a motion will be made to strike out the other sections of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment by way of substitute, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BLANTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BLANTON. To offer a preferential amendment. This amendment which the gentleman from Louisiana has just offered is in the nature of a substitute. I have an amendment to perfect the section, which takes precedence over the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman's amendment simply a perfecting amendment to this section?

Mr. BLANTON. A perfecting amendment to the first section, and I offer it as a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to have the amendment reported.

Mr. BLANTON. But I should be permitted to have a vote upon mine first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will determine that later. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The point of order is that under the rules of the House, which control the committee, perfecting amendments are preferential and take precedence over substitute amendments. An amendment to a paragraph read in the committee which perfects that paragraph takes precedence over an amendment offered as a substitute. The Chair has seemingly ruled to the contrary, and I do not think the Chair wants to make a ruling that could be used as a precedent in the future that is not sound. The amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana is a substitute not only for the paragraph but for the entire bill, and I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is that a perfecting amendment takes precedence over a substitute amendment, but if the amendment by way of substitute has been offered, the Member obtaining recognition, and then some one else subsequently obtains recognition and says he has a preferential amendment to offer, the preference relates only to the action by the committee upon the amendment and not to the method of offering it. The Chair will later recognize the gentleman from Texas to offer his amendment, but at the present time the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana may be reported.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentay inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUBEY. Is it necessary to reserve all points of order upon the amendment before it is read?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that comes too late, because there has been argument upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, the amendment has not yet been reported.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like, if it is practicable, to have the amendment that I have offered read and then submitted to the Chair without discussion now of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will determine that later. The amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ASWELL: Strike out the section and insert:

Be it enacted, etc.—

(7) If the interstate association finds by a vote of two-thirds of its members that any State association, or any local association which is a member of a State association, has failed to comply with any regulation prescribed under this section, the interstate association shall adopt a resolution publishing such finding. Upon the adoption of any such resolution the State association shall be ineligible, for such period of time as the interstate association may designate in the resolution, to obtain any loan provided in section 302, to be represented at an annual convention of representatives of State associations, or to obtain the exemptions accruing to it by reason of the benefits of section 302, except that if the violation is that of a local association the State association shall not be held ineligible under this subdivision if, within 30 days after the adoption of the resolution, the membership of the local assocation in the State association is terminated or suspended for such period of time as the interstate association may designate in its resolution.

OPERATING ZONES

SEC. 205. For the purpose of facilitating the marketing of any agricultural commodity, State associations engaged in the marketing of such commodity, within such zones as the interstate association may designate, may consolidate their marketing operations in respect of such commodity. TITLE III.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

LOAN FUND FOR ORGANIZATION PURPOSES

SEC. 301. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, which, as appropriated, shall be set aside and reserved as a revolving loan fund in the Treasury, available to the interstate association until December 31, 1935. Payments shall be made from such fund at the direction of the director designated by the President, upon application therefor by the interstate board, and shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum until repaid from commodity assessments fixed by the interstate association.

SEC. 302. (a) The moneys in such fund shall be available for loans (1) to the interstate association for administration expenses of such association, including expenditures for the organization of State associations, and (2) to a State association for expenses incurred by it in its organization, or in the organization by it of local associations which are members of the State association.

COOPERATION WITH EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

SEC. 304. SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

SEC. 305. If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the applicability thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

RESERVATION OF RIGHT TO AMEND

SEC. 306. The Congress of the United States reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the provisions of this act.

During the reading of the amendment the following occurred:

Mr. CANNON (interrupting the reading when the Clerk had concluded the reading of section 1). Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that enough of the substitute has been read to show that it is not germane to the bill, and is therefore out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that enough has not yet been read for the Chair to determine. The Clerk will continue the reading.

Mr. CANNON (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that the Chairman has heard sufficient of this amendment to be convinced that it is not germane to the proposition before the House. There are many precedents for the Chairman's taking the matter under consideration before the reading is completed. This is a very long, involved, detailed substitute. Its reading in full will consume considerable of the time of the House; time which would be wasted when the point might as well be decided now. The very clause that has just been read indicates that it is not germane. It has been decided repeatedly that cooperation with the States is not germane to any proposition confined to proposed activities on the part of the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states that the question of whether the amendment will be read in full is largely in the discretion of the Chair, and the Chair is inclined to think that an important amendment like this should be read in full.

The gentleman's point is right on the proposition that when enough has been read and the Chair is convinced it is out of order the entire amendment does not have to be read. The Chair recognizes the rule as stated, but in this case the Chair, in his discretion, is going to have more read.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interfere with the desire of the Chair, but it does seem to me line 11, page 3, shows that this amendment or substitute is not germane and is out of order. It touches upon nothing in this bill; it amends existing law on other matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue reading.

The Clerk continued the reading.

Just before the conclusion of the reading of the entire amendment—

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will cease reading. The Chair thinks enough has been read to present the parliamentary point. The Chair will hear—who made the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. I make the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In order that there may not be a fragmentary showing in the RECORD as to the purposes of the substitute, I ask——

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the entire amendment will be inserted in the RECORD. The Clerk had almost finished the reading.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that the substitute amendment is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the proposed substitute is not germane to the bill. The lack of germaneness is so obvious that I shall not impose upon the Chair with a lengthy discussion of the question. For that reason I shall merely call attention to two items in the substitute which are particularly notable in their introduction of new and unrelated matter. In the first place, the substitute provides an entirely different agency. Of course it is a fundamental principle of germaneness that one individual proposition can not be amended by another individual proposition, even though it belongs to the same class, and it necessarily follows that one agency is not germane to another agency, even though their duties may be somewhat related. The bill pending before the House provides for an agency appointed by the President, of which certain Secretaries shall be constituent members. The proposed substitute provides for the appointment of certain men designated by name. Again, in the second section of the bill, and one of its principal features, is a section providing for the cooperation of the Federal Government with the States. It has been repeatedly held, and has been so decided by the present Speaker of the House, that any proposition to cooperate with the States when offered as a substitute to a proposition confined to activities on the part of the Federal Government is not germane and is not admissible as an amendment.

We might go further and specify a dozen provisions proffered by the substitute, all of which are wholly foreign to the bill and therefore subject to the point of order. But if one item in a substitute is subject to a point of order, then the entire substitute is out of order and it is hardly necessary to further impose on the chairman or needlessly consume the time of the House when those designated are sufficient to decide the question.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me it is not necessary to go any further than the title of the two bills to show that they do not pertain to the same thing. In the first place, H. R. 9033 declares an emergency to exist. That is the principal point of the whole bill, and it proposes to deal with that emergency by making an equality between agricultural commodities and other commodities, while the bill H. R. 8108 has for its purpose to encourage agricultural cooperative associations, an entirely different object than the original bill and in no way germane to it. The only similarity between the two bills is that they both deal with agriculture, but each in a different way, and one is in no way germane to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to be heard?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to make one suggestion in reference to the point of order. An examination of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Louisiana clearly shows that in many essential particulars it sets up a different character of machinery to carry out the purposes sought to be effectuated. I must candidly admit that the only condition on which the substitute as a whole can be properly submitted to the committee for consideration would be on the broad principle that the object sought to be effectuated by the two bills are identical. In other words, a reading of both of them clearly shows the purpose of this legislation is to meet an emergency in our agricultural conditions, and while it is true that different methods and machinery are set up to carry into effect the purposes by each bill, it seems to me that considering that a substitute is not necessarily construed when it is offered in this way with the same strict degree of construction as an ordinary amendment, looking at it from the broad purposes sought to be accomplished by both bills, the substitute might well be submitted to the committee for its consideration.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, may I say a word on this? I do not profess to have any parliamentary ability, but it strikes me a mere casual reading of these two bills clearly demonstrates the fact that their purposes are in no particular identical. This substitute which is sought to be offered for the McNary-Haugen bill is clearly for the purpose of encouraging agricultural cooperative associations. Section 1 of the substitute clearly states the purposes. It is to promote and stimulate the orderly flow of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce. Its purpose is to remove direct burdens and undue restraint upon such commerce in such commodities and also provide for the processing, preparation for market, handling, pooling, storing, and marketing such commerce of agricultural commodities through cooperative marketing associations.

This is a cooperative association bill. The McNary-Haugen bill, to which this committee has given months of hard, laborious study, seeks to promote an equality between agricultural commodities and restore a parity that has heretofore existed, checking back to the farmer the loss that is sustained in marketing abroad or elsewhere the surplus which we have for exportation. I hope the Chair will sustain the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] by way of a substitute undertakes to deal with the agricultural problem. However, the mere fact that it tackles the same problem does not necessarily make it a germane amendment. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] calls attention to some of the details of the bill offered by the gentleman from Louisiana which make it, it seems to the Chair, not germane.

The bill under consideration by the committee creates a Government corporation, and through the agency of that corporation—by the aid of other agencies—undertakes to artificially provide a means of taking care of the surplus exports in such way as to raise the price of agricultural commodities up to the point where the ratio will be the same on agricultural commodities as on other commodities over a fixed period of time, and it carries out that plan. Now, this proposition, while it undertakes to relieve agriculture, undertakes to do it in an entirely different way and in such manner as would not be proper by way of a substitute, because the committee would then have to vote upon the adoption of an entire bill, which would have to be rewritten on the floor and which has never been reported by any committee. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer my perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas announced that he had an amendment to offer, and the Chair said he would recognize him. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, lines 14 and 15, strike out the words "the corporation (created in section 21)" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the President."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of the bill these emergencies would exist for five years unless in the meantime the directors of the corporation should declare them to have ceased to exist. My amendment would place that duty in the hands of the President.

Did you ever see a salary drawer on the pay roll of the Government make a declaration that would stop his salary? No. And you never will see one.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman desires to imply that this $10,000 agent will not want to quit of his own volition.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, of course, he will not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not think he would.

Mr. BLANTON. He will not, and he will never declare these emergencies at an end. So you ought to leave this in the hands of the President. The President is the man responsible to the country, so let him assume the responsibility.

I want to show you how much divergence of opinion there is right here on the floor of this House about facts that are easily ascertained. For instance, we have heard four or five gentlemen, members of this committee, get up here and say that during the year 1923 there were $40,000,000 worth of meats imported more than those exported, $40,000,000 worth. Then, on the other hand, we have heard one or two of our friends deny that and say, as to exports and imports on meat, that the meat exported was $19,000,000 as against $3,000,000 of imports. So you see there is a tremendous divergence of opinion right here among the Members of this House. So how could you expect the five directors of this Government corporation to reach a conclusion that would conclude them out of a job—a $10,000 a year job? They are not going to do it, because whenever they conclude themselves out of a job, at the same time they are going to conclude about 50,000 other employees under them on the pay roll, out of jobs. That is what our friend from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] tells us is going to result from this bill. He says it is going to put 50,000 extra employees on the pay roll. That is what our friend from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] says, and he is on the committee. That is what other members of the committee tell us, that if we pass this bill it will put 50,000 extra employees on the Government pay roll.

It is, after all, to be on the Government pay roll, and I will tell you why. This $1,000,000,000 of bonds which we authorize this Government corporation to issue—debts which they may contract to that extent—is claimed not to be a Government obligation. It is not, legally, because you are so writing it in the bill, but when that money is expended and those bonds are held by innocent purchasers scattered all over this country in our districts and they come to you and say, "Here is a bond issued by the Government; here is a bond that was issued by a Government corporation; here is a bond that was printed in your Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and I bought it because I had confidence in my Government," you, every one of you, know that you will vote to hold that a moral obligation on the part of the United States Government, and you will make that bond good. So, after all, these employees are employees of the United States, and you will have them on the pay roll of the United States Government.

The $200,000,000 which is taken as an initial appropriation out of the Treasury is just the beginning of it, but it is the $1,000,000,000 worth of bonds that should confront us, should make us pause, and make us carefully consider this matter. Therefore I say this amendment of mine ought to be adopted because it would leave it to the discretion of the President of the United States and not to this board of directors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6202) to amend sections 11 and 12 of the merchant marine act, 1920, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. FERNALD, and Mr. FLETCHER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAINEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. RAINEY. To offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. Is the gentleman's amendment an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. RAINEY. No.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, and the gentleman's amendment would not be in order now.

Mr. SINNOTT and Mr. MOORE of Virginia rose.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, while speaking to the amendment, I really desire to cover in a very general way the merits and principles of the McNary-Haugen bill. Members of the Agriculture Committee have discussed it in detail.

Gentlemen of the committee, in the preamble to the Constitution of the United States, setting forth the reasons why it was ordained and established, we find one of the six great features of that preamble and one of the important reasons for ordaining and establishing the Constitution was to "promote the general welfare." The very first proposition in the Constitution, declaring the powers of Congress, authorizes collection of taxes to "provide for the general welfare." President Washington, in his final message to Congress, said:

> It will not be doubted that with reference either to individual or national welfare agriculture is of primary importance.

President Coolidge in his New York address, with his usual sagacity and almost epigrammatic succinctness, stated:

> Agriculture is an interest on which it is estimated that more than 40,000,000 of our people are directly or indirectly dependent. It represents an investment several times as large as that of all the railroads of the country. It has an aggregate production of over $8,000,000,000 each year. * * *
> You can not long prosper with that great population and great area in distress. * * * This problem is not merely the problem of the agricultural sections of our country. It is the problem likewise of industry, of transportation, of commerce, and of banking.

Into our hands, gentlemen, under the Constitution, is committed the welfare of our country. The welfare of 40,000,000 of our people is now at stake; in fact, indeed, the welfare of the whole Nation is threatened by a grave economic crisis on account of agricultural depression.

Why is the welfare of the whole Nation threatened on account of agricultural depression? Agriculture, let me inform you members from manufacturing sections, buys 40 per cent of your manufactured products. Agriculture to-day is buying 50 per cent less than it normally buys. Already we have heard upon this floor indications that agricultural distress is having its baneful influence in your manufacturing sections, and why is that so? Take my own district. Six farmers in Umatilla County, Oreg., four years ago paid an income tax to the United States of $26,205. This year one of those farmers pays $284. The other five show a loss of $35,000. Those farmers four years ago paid 80 bushels of wheat for a two-bottom plow, 21 bushels of wheat for a suit of clothes. To-day they pay for that plow 140 bushels of wheat and pay 31 bushels of wheat for that suit of clothes. For a pair of shoes they paid 6 bushels of wheat, and now they pay 12 bushels of wheat; and those farmers are the men—I will say those wheat farmers, because I am more acquainted with conditions in wheat sections than in others—those very wheat farmers of this country contributed $2,000,000,000 toward winning the war when they patriotically and cheerfully submitted to the reduction in the price of their wheat under what they would have gotten but for governmental agencies limiting that price.

The farmer, President Wilson told us, is "the servant of the seasons." He is more than that under present conditions. He is not only the servant but he is the subject; he is the slave; he is the serf of his surplus when that surplus must be sold in foreign countries and the reflex or the repercussion from that foreign price fixes or lowers his domestic price below the cost of production.

He is asking this Congress for some legislation to remedy that intolerable situation—that incubus on his business.

The farmer is appealing to this Congress not with some new-fangled proposition thought out overnight. The fundamental principles of this bill he has been studying for nearly two years. He has brought it to the Agriculture Committee of the House and it has been in the crucible, subjected to the fiery criticism of that committee for four months, and is now brought out on the floor of the House with the approval of that great committee. All the farmer asks, through the medium of this bill, is that you may help him to do exactly what the manufacturer is doing to-day, and that is, sell his surplus in foreign countries and not allow the foreign price to control the domestic market. The manufacturer is enjoying that privilege now. He can do it without the help of legislation except the tariff wall that prevents the reflex action of the foreign price controlling the domestic price. The farmer, on account of his great numbers and on account of the great magnitude of his business, must have legislation to enable him to cooperate one with the other.

The manufacturer can do this through his sales agency. It is impossible on account of the magnitude and the great number of the farmers to do the very thing that the manufacturer is doing. The manufacturer to-day is selling his surplus in foreign countries and the price of that surplus in foreign countries does not control or establish the price of his domestic sale. Why? He is protected by the tariff. Give us similar and analogous legislation. The farmer wants to see whether he can get his protection at the breech as well as the muzzle of the protective tariff gun and ordnance. All he is asking is that he may sell his product in this country not at the price you are selling your own commodities, because he is willing to pay the entire expense of this organization provided for in the bill. Therefore he is willing to sell his product in this country at a price 10 or 20 per cent below what you are getting for your manufactured commodities.

I am told a motion will be made to strike out the enacting clause of this bill. Under our parliamentary rules that means the death of the bill on the threshold of its reading for amendment. I tell you, gentlemen of the House, the farmers of the country were never more serious than they are to-day in support of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Gentlemen, if you strike out the enacting clause, if you spurn the farmers' petition as King George spurned the petitions of our forefathers, the farmer will feel hurt; he will feel aggrieved; he will feel insulted; he will feel outraged; and he will have a right to so feel. Some Members laugh and scoff at this bill. It is a difficult matter to refute a sneer. They say this bill is socialistic, bolshevistic. That was also said of the first homestead bill which Buchanan vetoed; but when Lincoln came in he signed the bill which has given us the great and magnificent development of the West—the granary of the Nation.

What answer do the farmers of the West and Northwest get from New England? New England, smug, condescending, and patronizing—I will not say Pecksniffian. [Laughter.] From the pinnacle of her prosperity she looks down from the top of the protection ladder to the farmer trying to climb up, and what does she tell him through Mr. LUCE? O Luceat perpetua. He tells the farmer to stay down there; "I am coming down myself." The farmer does not want the gentleman from Waltham, where Waltham watches are made, to come down the ladder; the farmer merely asks the privilege of climbing up to you on the underside of the same ladder. [Laughter and applause.]

The poet tells us—

> He raised a mortal to the skies
> She drew an angel down.

The farmer wants to raise a mortal to the skies; he does not want to draw an angel down.

Then Mr. LUCE tells us that we must not set aside natural and economic laws; that this bill may cost his city $80,000 a year more. Why the price of wheat was up over $2 during the war, it has now fallen way below a dollar. Has there been any appreciable difference or reduction in the price of bread where Waltham watches are made? Not at all. But admit that it will cost them $80,000 more, who is paying that $80,000 to-day. It is the farmers in my district and your district who are not getting the cost of production for their wheat and agricultural products. He wants us to continue to do it. It makes me think of the song:

> I wonder who is kissing her brow
> I wonder who is paying it now,
> I wonder who is kissing her brow
> In Waltham.

[Laughter.]

Oh, I do not think that the people in Waltham are pikers. They surely don't want my farmers to go down into their own pockets for $80,000; I do not think they will refuse to go 50–50 with the farmers.

Waltham does not want—

> To deal out a charity scrimped and iced
> Like a cautious statistical Christ.

The gentleman from Massachusetts may offer us the consolation that perhaps when Cape Cod Canal is completed our farmers will get a little cheaper freight rate through that canal. Smugly he tells these farmers that they are cultivating worthless lands. You go and tell that to the farmers in my district, to those men who paid $26,000 to the Government in income taxes in 1920, that they are farming worthless lands, and that they should discontinue such improvidence. Why, that county—Umatilla County—is one of the richest wheat counties in the world. It raises 45 to 50 bushels of wheat to the acre under the summer fallow system, and some yields, exceptional ones, have gone as high as 60 bushels to the acre. Then he admonishes us to discontinue raising wheat in such a county. He wants us to cut out our surplus farm products that have brought to the commerce of this country in foreign trade over $1,800,000,000. He would have that all discarded. Gentlemen, it is absurd. When he admonishes us to discontinue cultivating the fields that we have been cultivating for 50 years, I commend him to the Bible, to Proverbs:

> He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread. He that followeth vain persons shall be void of understanding.

[Applause.]

Some Members tell us with a sneer that this is a packers' bill, a millers' bill. I want to say that the packers and millers and the grain exporters appeared before the committee and denounced the bill. I think they were mistaken on their views on the bill.

Your office and mine have been filled with propaganda from day to day from these very sources—the miller, the packer, the big exporter—yet critics on the floor have the audacity to tell us that it is a packer's bill. The bill was drafted and thought out in its fundamental principles by our hard-headed farmers.

Then we have Mr. VOIGT, with all of his ridicule of this bill. After listening to Mr. SHALLENBERGER, Mr. HUDSPETH, Mr. CLAGUE, and to Mr. RUBEY, and a few others who dissected and puverized Mr. VOIGT's fantastic tale about the handling of that hog and that cow which the farmer is going to handle in such a grotesque fantastic manner, I thought—

> In hog logic he's a great critic,
> Profoundly skilled and analytic;
> He could sever and divide
> The tail 'twixt north and northwest side.

Mr. VOIGT must, indeed, have gotten inspiration for his argument from the nursery rhyme:

> Tom, Tom, the piper's son,
> Stole a pig and away he run;
> The pig was eat and Tom was beat,
> And Tom ran crying down the street.

Then take the tone of voice of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE]. In his very tone of voice he endeavored to strike awe into you as to the horrible things and possibilities in this bill. He predicted everything direful and foreboding in a tone—> * * * whose lightest word

> Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood,
> Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres.

That is the sort of stuff you have been fed upon. He says in the equalization fee or receipt the farmer will get only a rain check. Well, the farmers in my district would sooner have a rain check than the mere chance of seeing the next ball game through a knot hole in the fence. They would sooner have a rain check than a notice of an overdraft from the bank. Gentlemen, in deliberating on this bill, I want to commend to you what Bacon, the great philosopher and scientist, once had to say about those who are always inclined to take the negative side:

> Generally, such men in all deliberations find ease to be of the negative side and affect a credit to object and foretell difficulties, for when propositions are denied there is an end to them, but if they be allowed it requireth a new work, which false point of wisdom is the bane of business.

Gentlemen, do not listen to the tale, the sophistry, that this bill comes from anywhere but from the very heart, the soul, the fiber of our agricultural sections. They are praying for its passage, and they want to know if this Congress, into whose hands is consigned the welfare of the Nation, is unwilling or impotent to grant them relief which you would grant if there was the same unanimity behind proposed labor, railroad, or banking legislation as the farmers undoubtedly manifest for the McNary-Haugen bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the very able debate which has taken place on this bill with deep interest and with a great deal of profit, so far as the development of the facts is concerned. The gentleman who preceded me spoke of the stress which the first President laid upon the importance of agriculture. Nobody can dissent from the view which General Washington expressed, or which has been expressed by those who have followed him in that great office, to the same effect; but Washington said another thing in his Farewell Address which my friend from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] seems to have forgotten, namely, that nothing is so likely to breed trouble in the country as an excess of partisan spirit and an excess of sectional spirit. We ought to consider measures that are presented here for the relief of agriculture without any particular reference to the effect upon party and without any sectional feeling, because they relate to a problem admitted to be of the utmost importance, which it is incumbent upon us to attempt to solve to any extent that may be possible—a problem of more consequence perhaps than any other. It seems to me, however, that there are two reasons, if I may make bold to say so, for the conviction that we waste our time in the discussion of this particular measure. In the first place, I do not believe there is a thoroughly competent lawyer who will take this bill and upon its analysis conclude that it will stand an attack in the courts, and that is a point that I hope to discuss for a few minutes later on. That is one reason why it seems to me we are wasting time in considering this bill. It is a case of "dropping buckets into empty wells and growing old in drawing nothing up."

This is only one of several pending measures which may be considered, and that being the condition I am astonished at gentlemen who insist that the Congress ought to adjourn on June 7. The farmer works the year around. He works every day, and he works without any day of complete rest. We have been here for only six months, and if this bill will not serve the purpose, then we should stay here for the months to come and determine what can be done. [Applause.] If we stay here a little longer, we will have the benefit of the announcements of the two great parties upon this subject, and I would like to know what they are to be. I would like to look at the platforms of the two parties to see whether anybody has been playing politics with the agricultural interests; and you know some one has remarked that the field of agricultural legislation is a field in which cold-blooded politics is most likely to operate.

But, in the second place, aside from any question of the validity of the bill, there is another reason that constrains me to believe that we are now spending our time uselessly. It may pass the House, and it may pass the Senate, but it will never pass over the President's veto, as gentlemen have every ground for believing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If there is one thing settled so far as the attitude of the President is concerned it is that he will veto this measure if it should reach him in anything like its present form. Of course, it may be replied that nevertheless Congress can proceed to act as it thinks proper and trust the future of the bill to him; but why should Congress be dealing with this one measure instead of some other measure which he might be expected to sign, when it is known that he will veto this measure?

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. No; not right now. One thing is clear beyond doubt, namely, that this is a price-fixing measure. You can consult the dictionaries and consult writers who have discussed the meaning of the term "price fixing," and the more you investigate the less doubt you will have that it is a price-fixing, price-determining measure. The revenue law prescribes income taxes without actually naming the figures that will represent the income tax of any particular individual; but the income tax law is an income fixing law, and that illustration applies to this bill. However gentlemen may try to escape that conclusion, this bill provides for price fixing, and I submit that if the statements of the President of the United States can be accepted at their face value it is beyond question that he is committed to its disapproval. Let me go a little further than some of the gentlemen have gone in showing what the President has said. His statements are not remote in point of time nor do they lack emphasis. He came before Congress on December 6 last and used this language:

> No complicated scheme of relief, no plan for Government fixing of prices, no resort to the Public Treasury will be of any permanent value in establishing agriculture.

Then he sent a special message to the Congress on January 23, 1924, in which there was no modification of his December view indicated. He said that he would concur in direct appropriations to assist agriculturists, and that is what many of us are prepared to do. But as I have said, there is nothing in the January message to show that he had receded from his view in respect to price fixing.

In New York in his February address before the National Republican Club—and I am talking now to a sort of national Republican club when I look at you gentlemen on the other side of the House—the President said, after describing the condition of agriculture:

> I do not mean by that any unsound device like price fixing, which I oppose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask for three minutes longer?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The President has taken a definite position against price fixing, and we are now considering a bill that proposes, in its essence, nothing but price fixing. Now, can you assume he will sign this bill? I do not defer to him in all things, but I have supported him perhaps more frequently than any man on my side of the House and more frequently than many of you gentlemen on the other side of the House. [Applause.] I have enough confidence in his exalted station, I have respect enough for him as an individual, I have sufficient respect for his statesmanship to believe that he is not going to change his mind overnight and give his indorsement to a measure which he has condemned in advance. Does anybody dream that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, my friend from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], will turn and oppose this bill which he has so strongly advocated? If he did, it would be impossible for him to do such a thing; he would be called a weakling and coward. And, correspondingly, am I to believe that the President, after having taken just as strong a position against the object of this bill as our friend from Iowa has taken in favor of it, is going to face about suddenly and approve the principle of price fixing? I do not believe it.

If we are to adjourn on June 7 we are consuming valuable time. If the time is uselessly employed, then do not allow political or personal considerations to draw you away from here on the 7th of June or any other date in June. Let us remain here and exert ourselves to the utmost to promote legislation that will be signed by the Executive and will afford relief to the agricultural interests. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have discovered that I must proceed here a good deal after the plan of a serial story. I am going to speak five minutes now, and I want you to understand that at the conclusion of my talk there will appear the words "Continued in my next." I had no opportunity to speak to this bill while it was under general discussion. I put forth the most pleading solicitations to the distinguished gentlemen of the committee in charge of it, but could not make them yield at all, so here I am now, coming to speak piecemeal on this subject, five minutes at a time, and I am going to get those five minutes every time I get a chance while this discussion shall last. First, instead of taking up some other branch of the story right now, I think I ought to touch just a little upon the gospel as laid down by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], at whose feet I like to sit when he preaches true Democratic doctrine. But when he comes to me this evening and hands me a gospel out of all harmony with the teachings of the fathers in the party I must repudiate it utterly. [Applause.] I claim that my distinguished friend, Judge MOORE, is not preaching the gospel of true Democracy when he comes here and asks you to consider whether or not the legislation which we propose to frame will or will not meet a presidential veto. Gentlemen of the committee, that is none of our business. Our business is to legislate. [Applause.] The present Executive has opportunity to wield his veto if he shall be pleased to do so, nor will I assume to deny him that right. I particularly was distressed to hear my friend from Virginia—from old Virginia, if you please—come here and preach a gospel of a very different tune from the gospel of the principle urged by the fathers of Democracy in the Old Dominion.

I very much fear that my friend has not studied the gospel of Democracy at the feet of that one greatest constructive statesman of any age, our own Thomas Jefferson, or else he would be here this morning pleading, as Thomas Jefferson would plead, not for the cause of the farmers as a class, but for the cause of the American farm. And what did Thomas Jefferson say with reference to the American farm? Oh, my Democratic friends, will you not listen closely while I tell you what Thomas Jefferson said about the American farm? I can not recall the exact language, nor shall I try to employ it, but will you not let me put what he said in my own language and take my word for it that I will find his exact language for you in the books, if you so command? Thomas Jefferson said:

> The American farm is the best stone in the foundation underneath the house of the Republic, and if you impair the foundation the house is never safe.

Ah, my Republican friends, do you not remember how it was that Abraham Lincoln came on in after years and quoted the language of Thomas Jefferson, emphasized it, and declared that it was the true gospel of the Republic—that always we should legislate in the interest of the farm.

Now, I do not ask you to legislate in the interest of the farmer, because that would be something personal. I am almost a farmer, and so I dare not ask for any legislation especially in my behalf.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Concluded in my next. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I made a mistake. I did not mean to say "concluded in my next," but "continued in my next."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7220) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. McNARY, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. CAPPER, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. HARRIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized in opposition to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I imagine that there are a great many Members of this House who find themselves in the same frame of mind in regard to this bill that I am, or, rather, who found themselves in the same frame of mind in which I found myself at the time this bill was first introduced and brought up for consideration. I shall not attempt to deceive myself or you by saying that I had any clear-cut or well-defined opinion as to the soudness or unsoundness of the legislation, for I did not. However, after attending some of the hearings, and attending a number of conferences of both proponents and opponents of the bill, reading everything that I could get hold of upon the subject, and otherwise obtaining all possible information, I came to the conclusion—and it seems to me to be the wise thing for those of us who actually favor legislation in the interest of the agricultural interests of this country to do—was to resolve any existing doubts I had upon the subject in favor of this proposed legislation. I was largely influenced to do this by reason of the fact that I do not regard my own judgment upon these matters as infallible or above mistakes, although I have always undertaken, in the best way I could, to give study to the farmers' problems and to the agricultural conditions of our country. I feel it is only right and proper that I should give great weight and consideration, in a matter of this kind to some of the witnesses who have been called to give testimony in regard to the soundness, the practicability and the workability of the legislation now under consideration. [Applause].

I want to very frankly say that I have been greatly influenced in my own judgment in this particular instance by reason of the character and ability of these witnesses, of their means of knowledge, and of their indorsement given to the Committee on Agriculture that this legislation is sound, that it is workable, and that it will afford a substantial degree of material relief to the agricultural interests of the country.

It should be remembered that this bill has been indorsed by the Secretary of Agriculture; that this bill has received the careful consideration, attention, and scrutiny and scientific study of the great Committee on Agriculture of this House. That this bill has been indorsed by practically all, if not all, of the leading farm organizations of the country; it has received the sanction and approval of the leading farm journals of the country and of the editorial writers for such publications, all of these persons of whom I have made mention being men who have given many years of study to farm problems and to the agricultural interests of the country. I, as a legislator, feel it is my duty to show great deference to the opinion of men of this type and character who are well qualified to give opinions upon this subject, particularly so when our own judgment is probably not as clear and conclusive as we would like it to be. For that and other reasons I will support this legislation, and furthermore, oppose any amendments or substitutes which in my judgment are inimical to carrying out the true purposes of the bill as reported from the Committee on Agriculture and now here before us this afternoon. [Applause.]

This means, of course, that the proposed amendment now under consideration should be defeated, as well as all subsequent amendments or substitutes which will defeat or destroy the real and true purposes of this proposed legislation. [Applause.]

In conclusion, let me say in answer to the gentleman who just preceded me it has occurred to me more than once during debates on this floor that if I permitted myself to be too greatly influenced by predictions made here on the floor by Members as to what the attitude of the President of the United States would be with reference to legislation under consideration I would find myself in difficulty and be unable to reach any very definite conclusion upon any legislation, because there are always those prophets upon both sides of every question before us. [Applause.] We have our own responsibility; the President has his; let us exercise our best judgment and then pass the problem on to him.

Mr. Chairman, when a man is sick he wants relief, not excuses. The farmers of America are wanting this legislation, not excuses, and I shall vote to give it to them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that all time has expired for debate upon this amendment. The gentleman can get recognition on another amendment.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, which, without objection, will be read again.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 13, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY: Strike out the section and insert the following:

"SECTION 1. (a) It is hereby declared that there exists an emergency in respect of agricultural commodities by reason of the continued economic depression in agriculture; inequalities in prices between agricultural commodities and other commodities, resulting in a relatively inadequate return to the farmer for his labor and upon his investment; and the dependence of prices of such commodities upon the lower prices in foreign markets due to unsettled world conditions and lower costs of production.

"(b) The President shall by proclamation terminate the emergency declared by this section whenever the commission (created in section 3) determines that the emergency conditions have ceased to exist or are no longer controlling; but in no event shall the emergency be held to exist later than one year from the date of the passage of this act.

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 2. As used in this act—

"(a) The term 'export deficiency price' means the difference between the probable average selling price in world markets outside of the United States of wheat or swine, and the probable average cost of producing wheat or swine on farms in the United States plus 10 per cent.

"(b) The term 'customs scrip' means such scrip as may be ordered printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing by the commission provided for in section 3 of this act, in such amount and in such denominations as the commission may determine. Said scrip shall be accepted in the payment of all customs dues and shall be legal tender for no other purpose, and after its acceptance for customs dues it shall be returned to the said commission for cancellation in such manner as the commission may by regulations determine, the cost of printing the same to be paid for by the commission.

"COMMISSION

"SEC. 3. (a) There is hereby established as an emergency measure a temporary commission to be known as the United States Agricultural Export Commission (hereinafter in this act referred to as the 'commission'), to be composed of the Secretary of Commerce, who shall be chairman of the commission; the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be vice chairman of the commission; the chairman of the United States Tariff Commission; and an administrative commissioner to be appointed by the President from not less than three individuals recommended to the President by the Secretary of Agriculture.

"(b) The administrative commissioner shall receive a salary of $1,000 a month during the period of his service as such commissioner, and he shall not actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as such commissioner during the period he so serves.

"(c) The commission may appoint a secretary who shall receive a salary at the rate of $500 a month during the period he so serves. The commission shall maintain its principal office in the District of Columbia, in such room or rooms at the disposal of the Secretary of Commerce as shall be designated by him, and may employ such other persons as may be necessary, and fix their compensation.

"(d) For the expenses of said commission there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000, to be immediately available.

"(e) The commissioners and the employees of the commission shall take the oath of office provided in section 1757 of the Revised Statutes.

"(f) The commission shall make an annual report to Congress, and may make such regulations as are necessary to execute the functions vested in it by this act, and it may accept the services of any person without compensation.

"(g) The commission may adopt a seal which shall be judicially noticed and may alter it at pleasure.

"(h) The commission may make contracts.

"POWERS OF COMMISSION

"SEC. 4. (a) The commission shall estimate and publish in such manner as it may by regulations determine the export deficiency price on the first day of each month during the period of the emergency provided for herein, and said export deficiency price may be changed on the first day of any month during the emergency period.

"(b) Whenever during the emergency period wheat or flour or products of swine are exported, the exporter shall be paid in emergency scrip the export deficiency price entering into such shipment in such manner as the commission may by regulation determine: Provided, That no customs scrip payment shall be allowed on such exportations of stocks of wheat, flour, or food products of swine as may be in primary market or in the possession or ownership of grain dealers, millers, or packers at the time of the passage of this act.

"TARIFFS AND PENALTIES

"SEC. 5. (a) During said emergency period the President shall by proclamation add to the existing rate of duty on said products or their derivative or substitutes for them such amounts as may be requested by the commission in order to make effective the provisions of this act.

"(b) Any person who knowingly counterfeits or alters or falsely makes any customs scrip shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

"COOPERATION WITH EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

"SEC. 6. (a) Any governmental establishment in the executive branch of the Government is authorized to act as agent of the corporation in the administration of functions vested in them by this act. The corporation may, in cooperation with any such Government establishment, avail itself of the services and facilities of such Government establishment in order to avoid preventable expense or duplication of effort.

"(b) The President may by Executive order direct any such Government establishment to furnish the corporation with such information and data pertaining to the functions of the corporation as may be contained in the records of such Government establishment. The order of the President may provide such limitations as to the use of the information and data as he deems desirable.

"(c) The corporation may cooperate with any State or Territory, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or with any person.

"SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

"SEC. 7. If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person, commodity, or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the applicability thereof to other persons, commodities, and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

"RESERVATION OF RIGHT TO AMEND

"SEC. 8. The Congress of the United States reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the provisions of this act."

During the reading of the amendment the following occurred:

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the substitute is not germane to the bill, and suggest to the Chairman that sufficient of the substitute has been read to demonstrate its lack of germaneness and that the time of the House would be conserved if the point of order could be passed upon at once without waiting for the reading of the entire substitute. If the Chair desires to hear a discussion of the question, the section which has just been read by the clerk provides in effect for the coinage of the money. It establishes a circulating medium. It authorizes the issuance of a scrip which shall be accepted as legal tender. Certainly, that can not be said to be germane to any section of the pending bill, and if any one item in the substitute is not germane, then, of course, the entire substitute is subject to the point of order. I can not conceive of any section in the bill to which this could be properly attached or to which it could be said to be germane. It is therefore clearly out of order.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the bill we are considering depends entirely for its operation upon the issuing of scrip, and my amendment in its terms has exactly the same object in view as the bill we are considering. The emergency is declared in my amendment in almost the identical language as the emergency is declared in the bill we are considering except that there is not so much of it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It is true that the scrip is provided for in the pending bill, but does the pending bill provide that that scrip shall be made legal tender for any purpose whatever; if so, in what section?

Mr. RAINEY. There is scrip provided for in the pending bill. It is legal tender provided it is not destroyed by the amount of losses the commission sustains at the conclusion of a period, an indefinite period, when certain losses are charged back against this scrip or these "emergency receipts" provided for in this bill; whatever remains of that particular scrip is redeemable and is redeemable in legal tender money of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. But is it anywhere made negotiable?

Mr. RAINEY. No; and this is not made negotiable.

Mr. CANNON. Or is it anywhere provided that it shall be legal tender for any purposes?

Mr. RAINEY. Neither do I make this scrip negotiable. There is not a particle of difference between this bill and the objects it expects to attain, and the methods of attaining them, and the bill I am trying to substitute now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that on the preliminary question enough has been read, but it is a short bill, and the Chair thinks it might as well be read in full.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, if I understand this substitute correctly that is offered by the gentleman from Illinois, it is in the nature of an export bounty to exporters rather than a proposal to aid the farmers, and the bounty comes from the Treasury rather than having it assessed back to the farmers, who, under the McNary-Haugen bill, pay in a very large measure, if not entirely, the cost of operation. This substitute provides also, if I understand it correctly, for buying these commodities and paying these bounties, the basis for payment being cost of production plus 10 per cent, whereas the McNary-Haugen bill, which is under consideration, provides for the establishment of a ratio price brought about by certain mathematical calculations based upon figures of the Department of Labor, putting the producer and his products to-day in the same identical position in which he found himself in the 10-year period 1905 to 1914. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, this substitute is open to the same criticism that applied to the substitute previously offered and ruled out of order, namely, that to take the McNary-Haugen bill away from this committee and substitute this bill means that its details must be worked out on the floor by the committee rather than in the Agricultural Committee. For those reasons and for others that have already been suggested, I sincerely hope the point of order will be sustained.

Mr. CANNON. In addition to the point of order which I have already presented to the Chair and the point of order already so ably presented by the gentleman from Indiana, it is to be noted that in deciding a question of germaneness it is not the purpose of the bill which governs but the text. There is in this bill, for instance, on page 4, paragraph (f), a provision under which the proposed agency may accept the services of any person without compensation. That identical point of order was presented when the legislation creating the War Finance Corporation was under consideration. In that bill there was a provision authorizing the employment of men with compensation at the rate of $1 a year. An amendment was proposed authorizing the corporation to accept the services of such men without compensation. A point of order was made and sustained that an amendment permitting them to serve gratis was not germane to the proposition that they serve with salary. In the pending bill every officer and every employee for whom provision is made is to serve with salary, and the salary is specifically provided for. Here is a proposition, offered as a substitute, providing they shall serve without pay. It is, of course, not germane. The substitute as a whole provides for the creation of an agency similar in some respects to that created under the pending bill and, to some extent, with the same purpose in view, but it provides an entirely different method whereby that purpose is to be effectuated.

I trust the Chairman will sustain the point of order and confine the consideration to the bill before the House and germane amendments.

Mr. RAINEY. If these arguments to sustain the point of order are entitled to consideration and are conclusive, then it would be impossible to prepare a germane amendment to the bill unless you drafted it in the exact terms of the original bill. I undertake to say that an amendment which attempts to accomplish the results the bill attempts to accomplish, even in almost the same way, is germane. What are the essential elements of the bill we are considering now? In the first place, it is an attempt to raise the price of certain basic farm commodities to a certain level in order, as the bill announces—not in these words perhaps—to make farming a profitable enterprise, to restore the exchange value of farm products.

The bill or amendment I offer tries to accomplish the same purpose by issuing scrip which I call customs scrip, and also includes a tariff embargo. Those are the essential items in the bill and that is all there is in the bill we are considering, and all there is in this amendment. They both make appropriations from the Treasury.

My proposed amendment and the bill we are considering both authorize an appropriation from the Treasury in order to accomplish the same result. The bill we are considering authorizes an appropriation of $200,000,000 and this amendment of mine authorizes an appropriation of $50,000. There is some difference in the personnel of the commission. The emergency I have provided for in exactly the same language used in declaring the emergency in the bill we are considering. I copied it from the bill. There may be some slight changes in the interest of brevity. This amendment establishes an export deficiency price. My amendment contemplates that the commission shall estimate certain cost elements with reference to the sale of basic commodities. The bill we are considering does the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman say that the present bill authorizes a consideration of the cost of production?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; under this bill you must consider the foreign selling price and foreign production in order to determine the amount you are going to charge back against certain emergency certificates. It is the same proposition I provide for in my scrip issue—you can call it receipt, but it is the same proposition embraced in this bill. I provide for a commission which shall be an emergency commission. The bill we are considering provides for an emergency commission, and in the bill under consideration it is an export commission.

The commission provided for in my amendment is an export commission to be comprised of certain Cabinet members and others. It fixes the salaries just as the bill under consideration fixes salaries. It provides for employees, as does the bill under consideration. It gives the commission the powers that are provided for in this bill under consideration—not so many powers, but the powers in my commission are germane to the powers conferred by the bill under consideration. The bill we are considering provides for a tariff embargo on basic articles considered in the bill. My amendment provides for the same thing, in the practical operation of the bill, in almost the identical language. The bill under consideration provides all sorts of penalties. It bristles with penalties, but the only penalty in my bill is for counterfeiting, a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for five years. My bill provides for the cooperation of executive departments. My amendment provides that the President can direct the governmental departments to cooperate in the same manner as does the bill under consideration. It authorizes the cooperation of States and Territories, as does the bill we are considering. The reservation clause is copied from the bill under consideration.

Now, there is no difference; it is germane to the bill; it seeks to accomplish the same purpose by the same kind of machinery.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. Who pays the bills under the gentleman's substitute?

Mr. RAINEY. It provides an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States of $50,000.

Mr. PURNELL. All the people pay for it.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; and you provide for an appropriation of $200,000,000, and all the people pay it. The difference between the appropriations authorized in this bill and the bill under consideration is the difference between $50,000 and $200,000,000.

Mr. PURNELL. Is it not true that the producers share a large part of the expense in the McNary-Haugen bill? I do not mean indirectly but I mean directly.

Mr. RAINEY. I am talking about the appropriations from the Treasury.

Mr. PURNELL. And I am talking about who pays the bills in the gentleman's substitute?

Mr. RAINEY. The expenses of his commission come out of the Federal Treasury in the gentleman's bill, and they come out of the Federal Treasury under my bill.

Mr. PURNELL. Does the gentleman's authorize an appropriation of $50,000?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; and the McNary-Haugen bill authorizes an appropriation of $200,000,000.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman kindly tell me what can be accomplished with $50,000 toward marketing the surplus?

Mr. RAINEY. I would be very glad to discuss that, but that has nothing to do with the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] as a substitute for the entire bill is more nearly germane than the former amendment, but the Chair is of opinion that it does not come within the rule of germaneness. The object sought, of course, is farm relief, but that does not necessarily make the bill germane. The method is so entirely different in the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois from the method of the bill under consideration that it seems to the Chair that it is not germane. Both bills recognize that the question of price is determined somewhat upon the exportable surplus, but the bill which the Chair has rather hastily read, offered by the gentleman from Illinois by way of substitute, proposes to deal with this question of exportable surplus by giving a bounty to the exporter, evidently with the view that if the export brings a fair price, a fair price would result in the domestic market; but that is such a departure from the plan of the bill which creates a Government corporation, giving it power and authority to export, that it would not come within the rules of the House to hold it germane. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The bill I have offered as an amendment is the only solution there is of this question. It is the only proposition submitted to this House or to the Committee on Agriculture which accomplishes just what the farmers want to accomplish without resorting to the cumbersome machinery and the expense involved in the bill we are now considering. It contemplates no appropriation of $200,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States. It contemplates no bond issue of a million dollars nor of any amount. It appoints a commission, but it gives that commission no authority to enter into any kind of competitive business or any kind of business whatever. It does not overnight increase the holdings of the grain dealers who have now 200,000,000 bushels of grain in storage, or of the packers who have enormous amounts of meat packed in their cold-storage warehouses. It will not increase their holding $500,000,000, or perhaps more than that, in a single night if it goes into operation. It does not have a single objection that I have urged to the McNary-Haugen bill, nor that anyone else has ever urged to it. It contemplates an appropriation of $50,000 to pay the expense of the commission, and that is all. The way in which it operates is simplicity itself. If the bill we are now considering is defeated or if it fails to work—and it will not work if it ever becomes a law—I am going to propose and press before the committee for its consideration this bill which I have now offered as a substitute. The committee has given most careful consideration to the complicated provisions of the McNary-Haugen bill. The committee has conducted investigations most carefully. The hearings furnish an encyclopedia upon the subject of the farmer's difficulties. The reports prepared by the minority and the majority are veritable encyclopedias upon the subject. The committee need not have another five minutes of hearings in order to determine whether it, after the disposal of this bill, desire to consider or report out the bill that I am offering.

All of the members of the committee are experts on this particular subject, or ought to be by this time. They have been considering these matters for days and weeks and months, and I am willing to submit my bill to that committee, if this bills fails, and abide by their decision. My bill is the only bill that will produce the desired results. It applies only to wheat and flour and to the products of swine. It does not apply to corn, because the price of corn goes up as the price of hogs go up on the American farm. It does not apply to wool, because wool is already selling at an ample price, and we do not export wool.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not want to yield to anybody just at present. I will later, if I get time, and then I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Kansas, who is a member of the committee, and I shall be very glad to answer his question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. My bill does not suspend any economic law. It recognizes simply this fundamental fact: That we are exporters of swine products and of wheat and flour, and the farmer being a large exporter of these basic products that his price at the farm depends upon what he gets for them abroad. Does any member of the committee deny that fundamental economic proposition?

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. In just a moment. Now, my proposition provides for customs scrip to be printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, just about as the printing of these receipts is provided for in the McNary-Haugen bill. An emergency under my bill can not last over a year. The object of that is to prevent overproduction. If you provide for an emergency to last five years you are going to have the farmers who think they are going to get higher prices overproduce, and the more overproduction the more loss, and therefore the more difficulty there is in operating the bill—the more impossible it is. If at the end of the year the emergency is not over Congress can take such action as it pleases with reference to extending it. There is no implied promise to the farmers that for five years they can keep on producing and for five years get more money for their products. My bill allows the farmer a profit of 10 per cent over cost of production, and that is not too much, because nobody takes as many chances as a farmer takes in producing a crop. He is a gambler. The farmer takes the chances of rain, wind, hail, drought, insect pests. No business man takes so many and such great chances.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. In a moment. He takes all sorts of chances. No business is conducted on a smaller margin than I propose in my bill, and a profit to the farmer of 10 per cent is not too much. My bill directs the commission to estimate the average foreign cost price and the average cost on the American farm and add 10 per cent for profits to the average price of production on an American farm. My bill does not mean we are going to dump anything on the foreign markets at all.

It is not open to that objection or to the countervailing duty which other countries can establish against our products, because most of them have a law authorizing the establishment of countervailing duties if we try to sell cheaper there than here. There is nothing of that kind possible under this bill. There is no price fixing in my bill, nothing unconstitutional. There is nothing in my bill that keeps the farmer from selling his basic products at any price he wants to sell. Of course, he will sell at the highest price he can get. He has the right to do that. The bill we are considering authorizes the corporation to fix the price at which the farmer can sell, and if he sells for less he is liable to be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a year and fined $10,000. Tell me that is constitutional, that he can not do as he pleases with his own property. If this bill which you are considering should go into operation the efforts of the corporation to establish a ratio price, which would result in putting men in the penitentiary who charge a less price for their products than the corporation fixes, would result at once in a restraining order. The operation of this commission under the bill you are considering would be restrained in less than 30 days, and that would be the end of all operations under the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I am going to yield to everybody in just a moment if I can get the time. My bill provides for payment in customs scrip when the products we are discussing are exported during the emergency period to the exporter of the export price difference described in my bill. That is all there is to it. You can not use the emergency scrip for any other purpose except to pay import duties at our ports. What would the loss be? The loss at our ports in customs duties, according to my computation, would be less than $60,000,000 a year.

If there is no recouping or set-offs against the losses. There are opportunities for set-offs. If my emergency bill is put in operation, it gives to the farmers of this country every year five or six hundred million dollars more for their basic products. It restores their buying power and restores it completely. If you restore their buying power, they can buy more things, and therefore increase the customs receipts. In addition to restoring the farmer's buying power, my bill also puts him back in the income-tax-paying class. So, taking all of these elements into consideration, the loss will not be $60,000,000. The loss will be absolutely negligible. What if the loss is $60,000,000? That is only one-fifth of the amount you are this year giving back as a bonus to the very rich of the country in their tax rebates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. May I ask for five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RUBEY. Reserving the right to object, I am not going to spend all the afternoon waiting to hear the gentleman talk unless I have the opportunity to ask him a question.

Mr. RAINEY. I have asked for the time for the purpose of answering questions.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUBEY. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact. First, in this article I have from a Chicago paper, dated May 15, it says we have arrived at a new process, of a new substitute for the McNary-Haugen bill, and it says, "Negotiable Federal certificates of a specific value would be issued for every bushel of American wheat," and so forth.

Mr. RAINEY. I have read that.

Mr. RUBEY. I want to ask the gentleman where this money is going to come from? Does it not come out of the receipts of the customhouse? Do you not by that amount keep that same amount of money out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. RAINEY. I tried to explain that in my remarks.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman says it is a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. RAINEY. I will state it again.

The object is to keep up the domestic price of these articles. My bill recognizes the fundamental economic law that the domestic price of these surplus products of the American farmers depends upon what they get abroad. The gentleman from Missouri recognizes that and the committee recognizes that in the studies it has made. My bill gives to exporters customhouse scrip when they export, enough scrip to equal the difference in the export price which enters into that particular shipment, which is the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production here plus 10 per cent. Now, as I said——

Mr. RUBEY. Does the gentleman mean to say that no money will be kept out of the Treasury. Answer that question yes or no.

Mr. RAINEY. I will explain it to the gentleman.

Mr. RUBEY. You can not explain it except by answering yes or no.

Mr. RAINEY. I will not answer by yes or no. I do not have to answer by yes or no. I am not on the witness stand But I will answer the gentleman. I have already explained it to the House, but I will explain it again to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman need not do that. I know how it is going to operate, but I want that question to come before this House.

Mr. RAINEY. I will be glad to answer the gentleman and bring it before the House. As I say, I have already explained it to the House, but I will now explain it to the gentleman from Missouri so that even he can understand it. We exported last year $116,000,000 worth of wheat, and we are exporting an average of $200,000,000 worth of pork products. We are not going to export as much this year, because there is a falling off, as the gentleman knows, in the breeding stock of hogs to the extent of 12 per cent.

Mr. RUBEY. I do not care about that. I want to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman wants an answer to his question, I take it?

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman answer one more question?

Mr. RAINEY. I will answer this, and then I will answer any other question. I take it the gentleman is asking his questions in as good faith as I am attempting to discuss them, and I am sure he is.

Mr. RUBEY. I will agree with the gentleman on that absolutely.

Mr. RAINEY. And the gentleman will accord me the same consideration. So I want to answer the gentleman fully, and I know he wants me to do that. There will not be as much wheat produced this year, because in my country—and I live in a wheat-growing district—they have already plowed up half of the winter wheat, and the lack of production as to swine and wheat will be reflected in the exports. It will not affect the amount we consume here at home, and so taking those things into consideration——

Mr. RUBEY. Just one more question for information.

Mr. RAINEY. Wait until I get through with this. If the gentleman does not want his questions answered I will be glad to stop my attempts to answer. Now, taking those things into consideration, the amount of this scrip tendered at customhouses, will be between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 a year. I said that before. Now, when this scrip is tendered it does not represent a loss, because there are offsets against it. If the gentleman from Missouri will give me his attention while I explain this I think he will recognize this, because he is, or ought to be by this time, an expert on this subject, and the committee of which he is a member has given close attention to this subject. Now, when you restore the buying power of the farmers—and you are going to do it under my proposition—you are going to give the farmers $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 more for their crops this year and he will then again be in the income-tax paying class, and this amount of income taxes he will pay will entirely meet and overcome this apparent loss at the customhouse.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MAPES). The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. RAINEY. For the purpose of answering questions, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. RAINEY. I will recognize gentlemen in order who ask questions.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The gentleman has discussed this for nearly half an hour.

Mr. SABATH. But this is an important subject and we should have some information on it. This is a new subject.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I feel forced to object to further time on this provision. I think we shall come to a time in this bill when we can properly discuss this.

Mr. RAINEY. I can not answer these questions unless I have the time.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. I renew it; I object.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, a motion is pending to strike out the last two words, and I must raise a point of order against the gentleman's motion.

Mr. RAINEY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Then, Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I think I have a preferential amendment which goes to perfecting the preamble of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Idaho.

THE MAN AT THE CROSSROADS

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, there came to my desk the other day a letter which referred to the farmer as "the man at the crossroads," and primarily, in considering the McNary-Haugen bill, it is the man at the crossroads whose interests are immediately concerned, though in a large sense nothing either for good or for ill can affect the man at the crossroads that does not affect likewise peoples living in our populous centers, peoples engaged in all lines of activities, business interests, great and small everywhere.

It is not necessary for me to stress the reasons for the consideration of a measure designed primarily for the relief of agriculture.

If the effects of war could end with the signing of an armistice, this world of ours would to-day be a happy place within which to dwell, but the effects of war carry on, and while they will never cease to modify the destinies of humankind, certain it is that for some years after the havoc of war it is not a difficult matter to point the finger to results here and results there which war has caused.

In a normal economic world the price of labor and the price of commodities have a way of adjusting themselves to an approximately equitable basis without the interference of government; but when conditions are not normal, when conditions have been made abnormal, and have been modified violently in some respects by government itself, and have not been modified correspondingly in other respects, then there must be hardship upon those people or those interests that have suffered through modification.

To-day the farmer finds himself buying in world markets where the costs of commodities have increased enormously, and he is required to sell in the same markets where the price of products that he has to sell is but little above the price of the pre-war period.

Some time ago a representative of the Bethlehem Steel Co. was in my office, and he told me that this manufacturing concern is required to pay as much for its raw materials as it sold its finished products for before the war. What is true of the Bethlehem Steel Co. is doubtless true of manufacturing plants that manufacture farm implements, wagons, building material, in large part, and a multitude of commodities that the man at the crossroads must buy.

The wages of men working upon the railroads of the United States are to-day more than 100 per cent higher than they were before the World War. Freight rates that the farmer must pay are between 50 and 60 per cent higher than pre-war freight rates. Metals and metal products that railroads must buy for the maintenance of rolling stock and tracks and equipment have increased 41 per cent. Fuel necessary for the operation of the railroads has increased 67 per cent in the last 10 years.

For the quantity of clothing that the farmer could purchase with 100 bushels of wheat in 1913 he is required now to pay nearly 200 bushels of wheat. If he desires to build a barn or granary or house, he must pay something like 170 bushels of wheat for the material for which he would have paid about 100 bushels 10 years ago. And when his wife goes to the near-by town to do her shopping, she is required to pay nearly three-fourths as much again for household goods that she was asked to pay in 1914.

Measured by conditions as they were before the World War, the condition of the American farmer to-day is most deplorable.

I live in an agricultural section of the country that was built up on the basis of transportation, freight rates, prices of commodities, price of labor as they were prior to 1914, and in that section of country the economic condition to which I have called attention has become desperate. Many banks in my State have failed during the last two or three years. Many business houses on the same capital investment are transacting but 50 per cent of the business that they were transacting in 1920; and I believe that what is true there is true in greater or less degree throughout the agricultural sections of the United States.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] in his able address on the subject said that the depressed conditions in farming sections do not find their limits there, but that his own section of country is experiencing depression as well. He said that the spindles in the mills of cities in his district are running four days instead of six during every week.

This suggestion emphasizes my statement a moment ago that in the well-being of the farmer is wrapped up the well-being of people in other lines of industry, in other walks of life.

During the last year I have attended conference after conference of farmers and have listened and had a part in discussing conditions and ways and means through which relief might be obtained in an earnest endeavor to be helpful in working out a solution. I am compelled to recognize that an emergency exists that must be corrected by team work on the part of all our people in order that further havoc may be spared.

Six months ago there met in Washington representatives of farming organizations from every part of the United States. They came here after many local conferences, much publicity, and advocacy of various relief measures that had been urged, and they were here to compare notes and to see if somehow there could not be worked out a plan by which relief could be attained. These representatives of agricultural communities were the most level-headed, the most far-seeing men who could be chosen from their respective communities for the consideration of the problem of farmers. They not only represented others but they represented themselves. In many instances the whole work of a lifetime was bound up in the wisdom or unwisdom of the solution of the problem before them. They considered numerous relief proposals, and finally as a result of all their study they came to the conclusion almost unanimously that the principle embodied in what is known as the McNary-Haugen bill is the principle that affords the greatest promise of relief.

The Department of Agriculture has been a sort of clearing house of all proposals that have been made and it has come to this same conclusion. The Committee on Agriculture of the House, after months of hearings and consideration, by an overwhelming vote has reported this bill to the Congress; and in my judgment this is the measure that must be passed by the Congress if any relief is to be extended.

WHAT DOES THE M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL DO

When the various proposals were brought to my attention the first question that I asked was—what do they do? That is the question that I asked touching the McNary-Haugen bill.

And here is what it proposes to do:

First. It creates an agricultural export commission through which there is organized a corporation to engage in buying and exporting certain defined farm commodities.

Second. It is provided that this commission may establish a price ratio to be paid for these commodities based upon the relative price of commodities recognized in the bill to commodities for a period of 10 years before the World War.

Third. It provides for limiting the sale in the home market of the United States of the normal amount of the several commodities produced through the purchase of the surplus product and through the inhibition of imports from foreign countries.

Fourth. It provides for part payment in cash, and to meet the balance for the issuance of what may be called credit—and what was called scrip in the original bill—for the purpose of distributing the profits or losses and expenses of conducting the business of the corporation.

Fifth. It provides that all buyers shall use this scrip or credit receipt, buying it for their own transactions from the export commission, and that the same shall be redeemed at the end of the year in the amount that may be received from the export surplus, less operating expenses.

If I could define the work of the export corporation in brief space, I would say that it is intended to be a sort of board of directors to represent the millions of producers of a given commodity, in handling the products of these millions of producers in disposing of the commodity at home and upon the world market.

IS IT PRACTICABLE?

The second question I asked when the measure was brought to my attention was—is it practicable?

In endeavoring to answer this question, I said: Suppose, as applied to wheat, that 100 men in the United States at the beginning of the wheat harvest of 1923 had owned and controlled the 800,000,000 (plus) bushels of wheat that the United States produced, would these 100 men have sold and be selling their wheat at 90 cents or $1 a bushel when they should be receiving $1.50 a bushel, upon the basis of other commodities and labor prices? I said, no.

Suppose that this group of 100 men consisted of John Pierpont Morgan, Elbert Gary, Cudahy, and Swift, Henry Ford, Julius Barnes, Barney Baruch, and other men accustomed to large enterprises, what would they have done? I will tell you what they would have done. Assuming that a tariff or embargo could prevent foreign importation, they would have withdrawn 200,000,000 bushels of wheat from the home market; they would have let it be definitely known that they did not propose to sell this 200,000,000 bushels in the home market.

They would have said, "You may purchase the balance or any of the balance of the 600,000,000 bushels at $1.50 per bushel," and mills and other consumers of wheat would immediately have been compelled to accede to the proposition and pass on whatever adjustments might need to be made to the consumers of our country. This same group of 100 men would have taken the extra 200,000,000 plus bushels of wheat and they would have sold it on the world markets. They would not have given it away, and they would not have received $1.50 per bushel for it. They would have sold it at the price of wheat in Liverpool, and whatever they received for it they would have regarded as just so much additional profit to be added to the price that they had received for the wheat they had sold at home.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. FRENCH. Not right now.

In other words, they would have applied to the handling of the wheat of the United States, if they had owned it, precisely the same principle that for 25 years, we have been told, have been applied by manufacturers in the sale of surplus farm implements, in the sale of meat products, in the sale of manufactured articles of various kinds.

You then ask, if 100 men, owning the wheat, can do this thing, why can not the same thing be done by three or four million farmers who have raised the wheat? My answer is, because there are three or four million instead of 100; because the farmers of one county or State are not doing teamwork with the farmers of the adjacent county or State; in other words, because the farmers are so great in numbers that it is an exceedingly difficult thing for them to function as a limited number of men can function in the meeting and handling of situations such as this.

The McNary-Haugen bill provides a way by which an export corporation created by the measure, functioning under the authority of the Government, can do precisely for the farmers as to a given commodity what the 100 men referred to would do if they had charge of the proposition.

WILL THIS BILL ENCOURAGE OVERPRODUCTION?

The third question that I asked was, Will this bill encourage overproduction?

In answering this question I must rely largely upon the experts of the Department of Agriculture and the experts of different farm organizations who have discussed the situation with me personally and before the Committee on Agriculture.

They tell me that the bill will not encourage overproduction. They tell me—

First. That during the war, referring to wheat, with all the encouragement that could be given, with a basic price of $2.25 a bushel, the maximum yield was approximately 962,000,000 bushels within the United States. They tell me that with the cost of production approximately the same as at that period, it is altogether unreasonable that that figure could ever be attained again.

Second. They tell me that it would not be economical to attempt to raise wheat on lands that are not already used for wheat-growing purposes.

Third. They tell me that the measure contains within itself the cure for any overproduction, and that the cure lies in the fact that the larger the yield the smaller would be the price received for the surplus in foreign countries, and consequently there would be the constant tendency to drive down (1) the quantity of production and (2) the total price received for the commodity; that is, the home price plus the price for the surplus.

IS THERE A PRECEDENT?

Gentlemen, I want to bring to your attention the thought that it is the duty of our country to meet an emergency if a way can be found. I believe that the Members of this House desire to find a way.

Most of the activities that are carried forward under our Government are not activities that are essential to government itself, but are activities that are carried forward for the convenience or for the economic advantage of all of our people or for a considerable number of our people.

More than that, our Government is performing the function of an agency that has its existence for the benefit of all when it meets emergency conditions by emergency measures.

Much has been said of the advantage of the passage of the immigration laws to those engaged in industry, and because the immigration law will limit the labor supply, it is pointed out that thereby it will enable the labor of the United States to command a higher wage. There is merit in that argument.

It is pointed out that the tariff redounds to the benefit of groups in different industries, employers and employed; and there is merit in the argument that if the Government can give benefit through tariff to those who will profit under it, a way should be found to meet the present crisis touching agriculture.

Gentlemen, let me bring home to you instances where the Government has come to the relief of groups of our people that are more striking still and where the action taken is more nearly akin to the action that it is proposed shall be taken by the enactment of the McNary-Haugen bill.

The World War was brought upon civilization in the summer of 1914. The ships engaged in raiding commerce, mines that were laid by one enemy nation or another, constituted such hazards that caused marine insurance companies to limit the field of their activities and to refuse to assume the risks that in times of peace would be bid for by competing insurance companies. An appeal was made to the Government of the United States, and, in 1914, the war risk insurance act was passed providing that the Federal Government insure vessels and cargoes of the United States engaged in commerce upon the high seas. Our Government, through the agency that was then established, conducted an insurance business until January 4, 1919, or for a period of between four and five years, and during that time wrote insurance premiums on vessels and cargoes that aggregated the enormous total of $2,067,273,293. Not only that, but during that period the Government paid losses that aggregated $29,220,613.42.

The Government set up an establishment to handle this business. It received in premiums more than $46,000,000. I do not know whether the cost of maintaining the war-risk insurance established for marine insurance was wholly compensated by the premiums paid or whether part of the cost was charged to profit and loss of our Government.

I do know that a crisis was reached in 1914. Our country was not at war, but a world war had disturbed economic conditions—the freedom of the seas—to such an extent that the individual insurance companies were no longer willing to assume the hazards of an insurance, upon which depended the owners of shipping and the importers of goods into the United States and the exporters of goods that we were producing in our country—and the result was that the Federal Government measured up to the responsibility and met an emergency that has now passed.

Suppose that in 1910 any Member of this Congress had been told that within five years the Government of the United States would be engaged in marine-insurance business; that within five more years the Government would have assumed risks in excess of two billions of dollars; and he would have said that such a situation was impossible. Yet it was possible, and it is now history.

Draw a parallel with this bill, and what do you find? The risk that was assumed then is the risk that will be assumed here. The premium that was paid then will correspond to what you may call the scrip or the credit that is held back here. Then, when the wheat is sold in the foreign markets, the balance is distributed to the owners of the wheat, just as the premiums for insurance would be returned if they were not used in handling the business.

Or again, who would have said in 1910 that within a period of 10 years the United States Government would have invested a gigantic sum of more than $3,000,000,000 in merchant ships, and would be the proprietor of the greatest marine transportation system that had ever been brought under one organization in the history of the world? There is not a Member in this Chamber who would have believed in 1910 that such a thing was possible; yet it happened. And why did it happen? It happened because a world war disturbed the lanes of the seas that had been opened to the commerce of our country to such an extent that ships were not available to take from our shores the produce that we had to sell to the markets of the world. We were not engaged in war when the United States entered upon this enterprise.

The United States Shipping Board was created by an act of Congress September 7, 1916. Under that act the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation was organized on April 16, 1917, given a capital of $50,000,000, raised through the sale of Panama Canal bonds, and invited to buy ships, to build ships, to engage in the navigation of ships, and to carry on this enormous marine establishment of gigantic magnitude. This was done to meet a crisis. The people of our country did not desire this program. Yet the program was carried forward with the heartiest approval of our people. It was new; it was novel; it was untried by our country; but it was believed to be an essential program for the protection not only of our Nation but of industries, that business might not be disturbed, that markets might be available for the products of our factory and mine and farm.

But that is not all we did. We provided in the shipping act, as it was modified in 1920, for the loan of funds not to exceed $25,000,000 to private concerns to aid in the construction of vessels for steamship lines deemed necessary and desirable.

Here was the Government not only engaging itself in an unusual enterprise, the merchant-marine business, but it was engaging in the enterprise of loaning money out of the Treasury of the United States to private citizens who were willing to engage in maritime commerce.

Let me make another illustration: The War Finance Corporation came into being as a result of the act of Congress of April 5, 1918. The war was then on and the United States had become involved. The purpose of the creation of the War Finance Corporation was to extend aid to banking institutions in financing such industries as were necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war. Loans were authorized to be made to savings banks and building loan associations. The War Finance Corporation was authorized to buy and to sell obligations of the United States and to issue bonds.

In 1919 the war had come to an end but the powers of the War Finance Corporation were extended and not withdrawn. It was called upon to undertake the burden of financing the railroads then under Federal control; but that was not all.

By the act of March 3, 1919, the powers of the corporation were still further extended. The war was over but the effects of the war were not over. Upon the theory that the Federal Government ought to assist in the transition from conditions of war to conditions of peace, the War Finance Corporation was given authority to make advances to the extent of $1,000,000,000 to American exporters and American banking institutions for the purpose of extending credit to foreign buyers. Millions of dollars were advanced through this corporation for the purpose to which I have referred. Then it was thought that there was no longer need for this institution and an effort was made to abandon the activity. But conditions that followed the World War continued to press heavily upon our country and the act of August 24, 1921, known as the agricultural credits act, extended still further the corporation's power and the organization was authorized to make loans for agricultural purposes to banks and financial institutions, including livestock loan companies and to cooperative marketing associations.

Here was an organization that in 1918 was given a capital stock of $500,000,000, and on November 30, 1919, the entire authorized capital stock had been subscribed. Here was an organization that was authorized to issue bonds to provide still further means for carrying on the purposes for which it was established.

Is there an analogy between the projects to which I have referred that have been undertaken by the Federal Government and the project that we are urging in the McNary-Haugen bill?

What was the attitude of business organizations throughout the United States on the question, in 1914, of the Federal Government engaging in a marine-insurance business that meant the writing of more than $2,000,000,000 of liabilities against the Government to protect ships and shipping upon the seas? Business organizations generally supported the administration in this emergency. The Government was doing that which was quite similar to that which we are asking in the pending bill.

What was the attitude of the banks, chambers of commerce, and business establishments generally throughout the United States when it was proposed that the United States consider engaging in the shipping business? We were not at war but we were facing World War conditions. We were facing a crisis just as we are to-day. Let me say the administration had the support of the great financial institutions and organizations through our country. Here was a project that is stupendous in comparison with what we are asking the Government to undertake in the pending measure.

What was the attitude of the business centers of our country when the administration proposed that the War Finance Corporation be established, to extend credit to shippers, and to banking institutions engaged in furnishing credit to houses that were in the export market business of our country during the war and after the war?

Gentlemen, again, let me say the most responsible business men of the United States recognized it as a solemn duty of the country to come to the relief of situations that it was felt were beyond the power of the banking institutions if left to their own means of financing to sustain.

I could go much further than I have gone in drawing the parallel of what the Government has done and what we are asking that the Government do here.

When the railroads were turned back to private management the Government had not only through the War Finance Corporation extended millions upon millions of dollars in credit, but the Congress itself wrote into the law a guaranty of 6 per cent profit to the railroads for a period of six months after private control would be resumed. The soundest business men of the United States urged upon Congress that this action be taken. The most responsible chambers of commerce and business organizations urged that it was the duty of Congress to guarantee the railroads against loss, and, in fact, to insure them profit for at least six months after private management had taken charge.

More than that, when the Government in the railroad administration act assumes to control the general policy of the interstate commerce this very undertaking presupposes that the railroads shall return reasonable profits upon the capital invested to the owners of the stock. This presupposes that the Government through the agency established, the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall work out rates for freight and passenger and other service that are charged up against the public that will compensate the railroads in their business.

I am bringing these things to the attention of the Members of this House for the purpose of challenging your good judgment in the face of the present crisis that confronts the agricultural interests of our Nation.

The farmers of our country are no more anxious than are bankers and other business men for the Government to engage in business or lend the strength of its approval to business enterprises that are normally carried on by private citizens, but the World War brought crises from which, try as we may, we can not immediately escape.

The one large group of our people that to-day is suffering more than any other group is that group that is engaged in agriculture.

Do you not see in the activities to which the Government has addressed itself for the relief of our country and institutions under our country during the last 10 years not only precedents to follow but precedents of such nature as to impel you to act with the same thought, the same regard for our common interest in extending, for the time being, the relief that is proposed in the pending bill?

WILL THE BILL HURT COOPERATION AMONG THE FARMERS?

In my judgment cooperation will not be injured by the McNary-Haugen bill. On the other hand, I believe the measure will help cooperation.

This measure, more than any measure that has been before the Congress, will show to the farmers of the country the advantage of team work, the advantage of cooperation.

Already in agricultural lines where the producers are numerically small cooperation has demonstrated and is demonstrating its value for the farmers, as manufacturers years ago learned it was of value to them. More than that, the burden of the testimony of those who are representatives of the cooperative organizations throughout the United States sustains this same conclusion.

Let me at this point refer briefly to an illustration touching team work. Do you remember that after the World War broke out in Europe purchasers for the different nations were combing the United States for commodities? Not only was Germany bidding against Great Britain and France, but Great Britain and France, fighting in a common cause, were bidding against each other. After awhile, through the sweeping from the seas of the German ships, Germany ceased to be a competing factor. But France and Great Britain and Italy were in the market; and they, fighting a common battle in Europe, were engaged in a commerce war among themselves as they competed for the products that America had to sell. Then what happened? These nations recognized the folly of such procedure and they worked out a sort of purchasing arrangement by which commodities that we had to sell and that peoples of other nations had to sell were purchased at a flat price, regardless of whether they were to be used in Great Britain or in France or in Italy or in Belgium. They set up a common purchasing agency.

The converse of this is precisely what cooperation will do for the American farmer.

WHAT DID WE DO FOLLOWING THE CIVIL WAR?

A few moments ago I referred to outstanding performances of the Federal Government to ward off disasters of the World War even before the United States was involved as a combatant. Now, let me refer briefly to some of the things that we did following the great War between the States.

A moment's reflection is sufficient to recall the history of that period, the dreadful economic conditions that existed in the North and South alike, and the fact that it took some years to accomplish readjustment.

First of all, from the Mississippi Valley on to the Pacific Ocean there was a vast expanse of land, including millions upon millions of acres that was made available for the establishment of homes with the minimum cost to the settler. Undoubtedly, in my judgment, the opportunity that the United States then had of furnishing homes to our people served as a factor of tremendous import in helping to relieve the people of all parts of our country from the burden of a terrific war.

Second, the Government extended aid to railroads some years later that the settlements of the West could be brought into touch with the markets of the East and the world.

Third, while the United States had been involved in war the great nations of the world beyond our shores had for the most part enjoyed peace; their peoples were prosperous; they furnished the buyers in a world market for that which we had to produce.

Fourth, taking advantage of that situation, it became the policy of our Government, through a protective tariff, to build up home industries, thereby to furnish markets at home and to produce commodities at fair wages to be sold both at home and in foreign lands.

TWO COURSES OPEN

To-day it has been said our Government has the opportunity of lifting the farmers up to the level of the standard of prices that obtain in other things or the opportunity of pulling down the standards that the war has fixed for labor, for fuel, for commodities of all kinds that the farmer must buy.

We can open the floodgates to the immigration of the world and by that act 3,000,000 or maybe 5,000,000 people can be brought to the United States within the coming 12 months to smash down the wages of those in our country who toil in the mills in Massachusetts, in the mines of Pennsylvania, and in industry everywhere. More skilled employees who are now here would take the places of many who are now employed upon the railroads of the United States, and the wages of railroad workmen would swing back to the wage before the World War.

This is not all we could do. We could repeal our tariff laws, and by so doing paralyze our industries, close up our factories, mills, and mines, throw millions of people out of employment, but at the same time smash the prices of commodities that our people must have in order that they may live.

But, gentlemen, either course that I have suggested is unthinkable. A man with the brute strength of Samson can pull down the pillars of the temple whose construction was attained only through profound wisdom. We do not stand for destruction; rather, we stand for a policy that will lift to the level of the average conditions throughout our country the condition of those engaged in agriculture.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLACK of New York: Page 2, line 9, strike out the period after the word "surpluses" and insert: "and the lack of a domestic demand for quantities of certain agricultural commodities."

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have sat through the large part of this debate, and it seems to me there is such a serious division of thought between the men from the agricultural districts that it behooves the men from the consuming districts to step in now and have something to say about this situation.

I confess I am always very jealous of the standing and integrity of legislative bodies, and I want to see this bill, if we enact a bill, in such form that the courts will have to stand by it. I do not want the courts to have any excuse to turn down this bill if we finally pass it, and I must confess to the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, who seem to oppose this bill, that they are divided into two camps. There seems to be a camp over here that tries to tell us that this is a bolshevistic bill and there is a camp over here that tries to tell us that the packers want this bill. Now, when those two camps can go into conference and come out and convince me that the packers are bolshevistic, I may be more sympathetic to that view; but at the present time I think this is an excellent piece of legislative draftsmanship. I think you have a fine skeleton of a structure here, but I think you need a few things to fill in and make it a real workable bill.

This is an emergency bill. An emergency bill depends on its standing in court for the existence of the emergency properly stated that the bill is designed to meet. You have stated the emergency here, and you have advanced a preamble, and what is your preamble? Your preamble, friends, is nothing but a paraphrase of the words "agricultural emergency." There is not a real reason in your preamble for the agricultural emergency. There has got to be some casual connection between your preamble and your statement of the emergency to satisfy the courts.

Now, the courts are not going to be satisfied with the mere statement; you have got to prove it to the court. I want this bill strengthened. My amendment is for this purpose—I am trying to indicate to the court under the present conditions that there is not a sufficient domestic market for the products of agricultural fields. True, the courts may say that you did not have to go to the extent of passing emergency legislation. The courts may look into the thing and make further investigation to find out if there is an agricultural emergency and if we farmers could not cure it in any other way than by emergency legislation. My thought is this, that this agricultural emergency grew out of the war. Everybody concedes that. There is no doubt about it; it came from abnormal conditions. But there was something else that grew out of the war, and that was prohibition. Prohibition came into the country by the way of an agricultural bill.

The United States Department of Agriculture issued a circular bearing upon this, and they say—

The United States is exporting about 20,000,000 bushels of barley each year, and the price of barley is therefore affected by the world price.

Notwithstanding that production has been maintained, market receipts during the past five years have been less than one-half as large as formerly.

Notwithstanding the production has been kept up the market receipts have gone down. Barley was used in large quantities in preprohibition days. Now see what the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture says. It devotes a paragraph to the subject of prohibition. You will find it in the Yearbook, Department of Agriculture, for 1922.

It says:

The most recent factor affecting the production of barley has been the prohibition of brewing. The brewers of the United States were using slightly more than 50,000,000 bushels of barley each year at the time when brewing was prohibited. This 50,000,000 bushels, while constituting only about 30 per cent or less of the crop, did cause a premium to be paid for the highest grade of barley.

I have here statistics compiled by witnesses before the Judiciary Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MAPES). The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, will the gentleman tell us where he got his figures?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of New York. These are figures not from an official source. The gentleman from Texas offered an amendment providing that the President of the United States might terminate the emergency by official proclamation. I think there the gentleman from Texas made a serious mistake, because the gentleman knows that the President might issue a proclamation terminating it the day after election. I heard the President speak over the radio Lincoln's Birthday on the farmers, and the tears that he shed were crocodile tears that fell on the heads of the interests before him.

I heard him cry over the farmer in a metallic way. The President can cry in a metallic way. This is a concession to the gentlemen of the majority. I have not heard a word from the President until the gentleman put him in here in his amendment.

As I said, these witnesses were before the Judiciary Committee. They state prohibition destroyed the market for three and a half billion pounds of farm products.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman give the name of any witness before the Judiciary Committee who testified to that?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I am giving the gentleman the figures. Does the gentleman doubt that the farmers who grow barley have been deprived of a market?

Mr. FOSTER. I asked the gentleman to name one of the witnesses.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I am telling you that the witnesses who testified to this before the Judiciary Committee were produced by the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment. I do not want to conceal that, and I have not the names here.

Mr. FOSTER. But the gentleman can not give the name now.

Mr. BLACK of New York. No; but what I am saying is that the farmer lost his market for barley due to prohibition, and barley farmers have lost about $1,000,000,000. Corn used in moonshine sold higher than wheat last year on the Chicago Board of Trade for the first time in history. When the brewers were using barley in 1916 and 1917 there were 67,981,577 bushels of barley used in beer. These figures were available because the Internal Revenue Department collected a tax on beer.

Moreover, they state that there were 125,000,000 pounds of rice used in beer during the years 1915, 1916, and 1917, and in the very next section of this bill you gentlemen have incorporated a provision taking care of the rice situation. I say this as a lawyer, regardless of the prohibition situation. Unless you accept this amendment that I have offered in this preamble, this bill will never stand the test of the courts on the emergency question. You have to do more for the courts than simply to say that there is an emergency and then describe the emergency. You have to show the effect following the cause, and the courts are doing their best these days to put down the power of the legislature to abridge the Constitution and meet emergencies. I submit this amendment in good faith. I do not take the position that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] takes toward the farmers. I believe we ought to reduce that spread between the farmer and the city man. We can reduce that by a mutual understanding. The farmer thinks that the city man is some kind of a burglar who is stealing what he has, and the city man thinks the farmer is some kind of a tyrant who is trying to force laws down his throat that he does not want. The city man is a poor man, just as poor as the farmer. I have many poor people in my district, much poorer than the farmer. These people seldom get the benefits of God's sunshine. The city man leaves his home to-day in the congested streets of the city and he does not know when he gets back at night whether or not his children will all be there with all of the automobiles running up and down the streets. You gentlemen on the farms have an ideal life—you love it—and I beg of you to so amend this bill that we city men can be with you men who are on the farm; and that can be done only if we can go back to the city people and say that we have done something for them, that we have incorporated some revenue in the bill to avoid the high prices. I want to say to you that no court has ever held that a legislature can fix prices so that they can be higher than they ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be permitted to proceed for two additional minutes.

Mr. UPSHAW. I ask that it be made five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the desire of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I will take four minutes. I do not want to be with either of the gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Oh, just a moment. I do not want to deal with any of you gentlemen just now. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas in about two minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. By all means yield to the gentleman from Texas. You can answer him.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But I reserve the right to object. Does the gentleman intend to confine his remarks to the bill and to his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding for four additional minutes?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Then I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6715) to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TINCHER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Is it possible that no man in this House outside of a member of the committee is entitled to be heard at all?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will be in order. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] is recognized.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I simply rise in opposition to the amendment, and I am sure that I do not want to take time that other gentlemen may want. I think this section is quite clear as it is:

The necessity in part for the existence of such surpluses in order to safeguard the domestic market against uncertainities of yield, and the economic impracticability of immediately preventing the continued production of such surpluses.

I said the other day on the floor that I did not think any greater calamity could come to the people of this country than to be forced to produce a shortage and to starve so many people in order to get a big price for what we produce.

It is absolutely impossible to tell exactly how many bushels of wheat will be consumed in America or to tell how many bushels of wheat you can produce in a given acreage in America, and for the happiness of the people of the country there must be a surplus of wheat and a surplus of meat produced in America every year. We can not produce very much more than was produced under war conditions, because then we used up all of the wheat land and a lot that was not wheat land in the production of wheat. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. I do not think that it adds anything to the bill. The section is clear as it is, and I do not want the American farmer at any place in this bill put in the attitude of being willing to go back into the liquor business for any relief. He deserves relief without any such exigency as that, and I hope every Member here will vote against the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have inquired at least five or six times from members of the committee in regard to how this bill would affect livestock and the products of livestock. There has not been a single member of the committee, for some reason better known to himself than to anyone else, who has given any answer to that question.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment. The cattle business is a part of agriculture, and we ought to know how this bill will affect the cattle business. It is just as much a part of agriculture as wheat.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment. The cattleman is just as much interested as the man who raises hogs and hogs alone. So far there have been only two items discussed, wheat and hogs. We have consumed 15 hours of debate and used up this afternoon on the first section of the bill, and no one has had an opportunity to receive information upon that question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Under the operation of this bill the corporation having determined a fair ratio price for cattle, which is higher than the price now, the corporation stands ready to maintain that price to the cattle growers of America, and the President is empowered to raise if necessary the tariff high enough to protect the cattlemen of America so that the cattlemen will receive the benefit of the bill as well as the wheat man and the hog man and everyone else.

Mr. RAKER. Well, Governor, I want to tell you you are the first man whom I have asked who has attempted to answer, and these thousands of people scattered over the United States are much interested in the raising of livestock—cattle—and in the raising of hogs and——

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have all my money invested in cattle.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I want to read—I will yield.

Mr. RUBEY. Is it not a fact that I took the gentleman out in the lobby yesterday afternoon and gave him the same explanation? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RAKER. All right. The gentleman read me some figures, and when he got through making his explanation I understood just about as much as I did when he started. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUBEY. I will read those figures right now.

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TINCHER. On page 9204 of the RECORD I tried to say the same thing that the gentleman from Nebraska just said, perhaps not quite as clearly and——

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I just wanted to ask, What is it the gentleman wanted to know?

Mr. RAKER. Now we are going to get light from the leader of the Committee on Appropriations. I greatly appreciate this, as he well knows. I enjoy his explanations.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to know what the gentleman wants to know.

Mr. RAKER. What would be the ratio price upon cattle this last year under the proposal in this bill?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. One at a time.

Mr. TINCHER. With beef cattle all the way from $2.50, according to weight, to $3 more than they are selling them on the market.

Mr. RAKER. Now, I am going to read something. A gentleman left in my office this morning this paper, and he said he knew more about it than anybody, and I want to read it for what it is worth:

Total beef and veal produced in the United States for 1923, in pounds, 7,787,000,000.

Total beef and veal produce exported in 1923, in pounds, 18,335,289.

Total beef and veal produce imported in 1923, in pounds, 7,402,941.

Exports over imports in 1923, in pounds, 10,932,340.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. I want to ask my distinguished friend from Kansas, if that statement is correct, is it sufficient for the President to declare an emergency?

Mr. TINCHER. Oh, yes; because we always have an exportable surplus on both hogs and cattle in the United States.

Mr. RAKER. This statement goes on——

Mr. VOIGT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. VOIGT. I want to say in that connection that the United States Tariff Commission in its report on this bill says that in the last year we imported more beef than we exported, and consequently the President could not put an emergency into effect on beef.

Mr. RAKER. Now, gentlemen, we have two distinguished members of the Committee on Agriculture presenting the bill, and one says there is an excess of exports over imports and the other says there is an excess of imports over exports. It leaves us in a very unsatisfactory position. I am going to read the statement of my friend:

Thus you will observe that the world price for the 10,932,340 net pounds exported fixed the domestic price on the entire 7,787,000,000 pounds of beef and veal produced in 1923.

You will observe that only about 1 per cent of our entire beef and veal produce is exported, and this 1 per cent fixes the price on the entire American produce.

You inquired several times during the debate on the McNary-Haugen bill how this bill would benefit cattle raisers.

The bill is more workable in respect to cattle than any other produce and would do more good to the cattle raisers than any other branch of the farming industry for the amount of money necessarily employed in the handling of the commodity.

Now, that statement I am taking to be true, and the committee, after all this time and after investigation and after inquiry for four days, have been unable even up to this time to give the ratio price that would be declared.

In view of the limited export of beef and veal, substantially all that would have to be done in order to make the bill applicable to cattle would be to declare the emergency, fix the ratio price, and raise the tariff as provided in the bill.

If we figure the entire net exportable surplus at 7 cents per pound, you will observe that less than $1,000,000 would be necessary to buy this entire exportable surplus.

Practically no machinery would be necessary in order to handle this commodity, and but little money employed. The purchase of the ordinary exportable surplus in process meats could be done as the occasion required at any time throughout the year and the market thereby supported.

It is amazing the amount of misinformation in respect to this branch of the bill. It is as simple as two and two are four. I felt as though your questions were repeatedly asked during the debate and were not answered to your satisfaction, and I hope that this will be a complete explanation of the subject. It will not be necessary for the governmental agency to go into the market. The establishment of the ratio price and readiness of the agency to buy this small exportable surplus at any time to stabilize the market is all that is necessary; and, of course, if you were a member of the board to administer this law you would immediately come to this conclusion, namely: All that it would be necessary to do would be to process meats as the amount of surplus was arrived at throughout the year.

The expert clerk has given this information, that if the ratio price is about 1 cent, therefore on a beef steer weighing a thousand pounds there would be an increase in value of $10; if 1.2 cents, it would be $12. On a 1,500-pound steer on foot at 1 cent it would increase $15, and another 1,500-pound steer at 1.2 cents would increase $18. I want to submit if the committee are able to say if that is true. If that is the condition of this bill, irrespective of the criticism against it, it is my duty as a Representative to stand before this Congress and present those facts, whether these people who have given their very life and existence for the last 25 or 30 years might have an opportunity to exist instead of starving to death. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not care what the gentleman says, I will tell the gentleman from California it is the truth. The gentleman took my word before, and I will tell the gentleman why this thing is hovering on the verge of importation, and it is because in Argentina, the greatest competitive market in the cattle business, to-day they are about as near ruined as we are here.

If the tariff is lowered the least bit, or if our price rises, they are ready to rush in their beef, so that we have got to have this.

Mr. RAKER. I always try to ascertain whether or not I can support a measure and use my judgment on it, and taking the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. RAKER. May I have just one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. As I say, taking the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] and taking the views of the committee as presented here to-day, it seems to me I could do no more benefit to the great country west of the Mississippi River, as well as to the country that is not within that territory, than to support this measure. The people in that territory have been raising cattle, and for the last 35 years they gave of their substance to build up their homes, beautiful houses, beautiful lawns, and great barns, as well as everything that goes to make up a home; but during the last three years they have been compelled to take from their reserve because of the depressed condition with regard to the price of cattle. So if I can vote and if I can raise my voice in favor of these men, whom I have known for 25 or 30 years, so that in the future they may get a reasonably fair price for their products, I want to tell you it is my duty to do so, and I now think I see my way clear to do it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia was on his feet trying to get recognition, and he is entitled to it.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia have five minutes to speak on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time on this amendment has been exhausted. The gentleman from New York demands a division.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK of New York) there were—ayes 23, noes 84.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DENISON and Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] has been on his feet for a long time, and will be recognized.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I am rising not because I think I can give the committee any information, but because I want to use this means of getting some information for myself.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] just made the statement, in a colloquy with one of the other gentlemen, that we have an exportable surplus of hogs and cattle. Now, I have received statements from various sources to the effect that exactly the contrary of that is true, and it does seem to me that somebody on the committee should be able to give us the information. I am not disputing the gentleman from Kansas, and I do not want him to take it that way. What I want to get at is reliable facts. I have a statement here issued by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. I do not know what value to give to it, but the chamber of commerce is pretty well known. This statement was sent to the Members of the House with this information in it:

Cattle and hogs we do not export as cattle and hogs and consequently producers of them can not have ratio prices fixed as to their products.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman let me answer him right there?

Mr. DENISON. I will, because what I want is information.

Mr. TINCHER. Here are the exact figures as to the food products of cattle.

Mr. DENISON. I am talking about cattle and hogs and not the food products of them.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman means live cattle and hogs?

Mr. DENISON. Yes. The gentleman stated a while ago—as he will see when he looks at the report of his remarks—that we have an exportable surplus of cattle and hogs.

Mr. TINCHER. Certainly we have, because out of cattle and hogs we make pork and beef, and no matter whether we kill them here or after exporting them, we produce an exportable surplus of cattle and hogs.

Mr. DENISON. That is what I want to get at. I want to ascertain the meaning of this bill. Are cattle and hogs to be considered exactly the same as their processed products?

Mr. TINCHER. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. The bill makes a clear difference between cattle and hogs and the food products made from them. You will find that the bill clearly makes a difference, and I want to ascertain whether it is true, as stated by the chamber of commerce, that there is no exportable surplus of cattle and hogs as such.

Mr. TINCHER. Oh, no; that is not true, because, if we did not butcher our cattle and hogs, of course we would have to export them alive, because we have an exportable surplus of them here.

Mr. DENISON. The question to my mind is what determines whether we have an exportable surplus; is it whether or not we export them? That is the question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If the gentleman will permit, the quarantine laws of European nations prevent us from shipping our stock upon foot, either hogs or cattle, to Europe, so we have to slaughter them here; and this measure applies to the cattle and hogs and to the products of cattle and hogs the same as it applies to the wheat and to the flour.

Mr. DENISON. Where is the provision in the bill which provides that they mean the same—that the two terms mean the same? The bill provides, if I read it correctly, that an emergency shall be declared whenever there is an exportable surplus of the particular agricultural products referred to. Now, then, will the surplus be declared as to the pork products or as to the hogs?

Mr. FUNK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. FUNK. The proposed law also provides in section 2, subsection 2:

That according to estimates made by it the ratio prices, as defined in section 4, in respect of the commodity, would be in excess of the domestic price thereof, it shall immediately notify the President in writing of its findings.

That means that if the ratio price of these articles is higher than the domestic price, or, putting it the other way around, if the domestic price is lower than the ratio price, then the emergency occurs automatically.

Mr. DENISON. I understand that.

Mr. FUNK. So you do not have to go to the point as to whether there is an exportable surplus in cattle or hogs or their products. An emergency may be declared upon a comparison of the ratio price and the domestic price, so why raise the question?

Mr. DENISON. I am raising the question for information, because I want to get information. On the contrary, an emergency can not be declared merely upon a comparison of the ratio price and the domestic price. Two facts must be found to concur before an emergency could be lawfully declared under the present language of the bill. First, there must be found to be an export surplus of the particular commodity, and second, the domestic price must be found to be less than the ratio price of that commodity.

If there is no export surplus of live cattle and hogs, then the corporation could not legally declare an emergency and a ratio price as to them. So it seems to me that the farmers who produce the live cattle and hogs would not get the direct benefit of this act, but rather it would be the packers and others who handle the food products of cattle and hogs, of which, admittedly, there would be an exportable surplus.

Mr. BURTNESS. I am sure if the gentleman will read section 2 he will find that this commission will have the discretion to report these facts, whether it be upon live hogs, upon live cattle, or upon any food product of such cattle or hogs—that is, upon pork or upon beef—and I want to ask the gentleman whether, after all, he does not feel that the chamber of commerce had rather a low estimate of Members of Congress when it presumed that the Members did not know that cattle and hogs intended for slaughter were not shipped across the Atlantic Ocean as living animals.

Mr. DENISON. I do not want to get into any controversy as to what the chamber of commerce knows. They have some considerable reputation through the country; they are doing business as a live concern, and are composed of pretty high-class individuals, and I felt I could afford to quote their statement and call it to the attention of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, in view of the discussions that have arisen with reference to the exportation and importation of cattle and cattle products, I have compiled a little statement from the figures of the Department of Commerce. I want to read this and I want to state that the Department of Commerce is the department which compiles the original figures. The figures given by the other departments are, for the most part, taken from the statistics furnished by the Census Bureau:

Cattle

	Head
Exports:
1922	111,000
1923	37,000
Imports:
1922	237,000
1923	137,000
Beef and veal, fresh—	Pounds
Exports—
1922	3,890,000
1923	3,385,000
Imports—
1922	36,693,000
1923	19,356,000
Beef and veal, pickled, cured, or preserved—
Exports—
1922	26,210,000
1923	23,041,000
Imports—
1922	6,794,000
1923	11,176,000

It may be noted here that in these tables the export meats are classed as "pickled" or "cured." The imports are classed as "prepared" or "preserved."

On the pickled or preserved variety the exports exceeded the imports.

In this connection, according to the United States Tariff Commission report of cattle and cattle products, in 1923 we imported $65,377,000 worth and exported $25,000,000 worth. The different items are as follows:

Imports and exports of cattle

[Calendar year 1923]

	Unit	Imports		Exports
		Quantity	Value	Quantity	Value
Cattle	Number	138,481	$4,272,775	37,194	$1,878,010
Beef and veal, fresh	Pounds	19,356,470	2,250,999	3,385,978	530,205
Beef, pickled or cured	do			23,041,039	2,340,349
Canned	do			1,733,968	473,182
Oleo oil and oleo stock	do			109,255,504	13,013,757
Tallow—
Edible	do			1,204,303	99,786
Inedible	do			34,671,935	2,632,904
Cattle hides	do	291,908,888	46,605,360	23,897,200	2,932,539
Calf and kip skins	do	48,092,070	11,309,878	3,982,384	863,693
Beef and hog fats	do	11,873,792	879,167
Total value			65,377,876		25,024,425

It will be seen from this table that on cattle and cattle products for 1923 the value of imports was $65,000,000 and the value of exports $25,000,000. This includes, of course, cattle hides. If these be eliminated, the value of imports still exceeds the exports by $554,000. If the inedible portions of the tallow are also excluded, the exports would exceed the imports by about $2,000,000 in value. I also desire to quote in this connection the following paragraph from the Bureau of Animal Industry in a report on meat production, consumption, and foreign trade, 1907–1923:

> Exports of beef at one time formed a large and important branch of our foreign trade, but by 1912 they had largely disappeared and foreign beef began to come in. The exports were large from 1915 to 1918 solely because of the war needs and have since almost disappeared. * * * Imports of beef in 1914, however, were quite considerable. At this period the sources of cheap beef in the Southern Hemisphere, especially Argentina, had developed enormously, and they had, in fact, supplanted the United States in the overseas trade with Europe.

Thus it will be seen from the various figures that it is difficult to tell just when we are on an exporting and when we are on an importing basis, so far as cattle products are concerned. Unquestionably, for the past few years we have been on an importing basis with reference to cattle. The figures would undoubtedly show that we have been on an importing basis, for the last two years, at least, with respect to cattle products; also with respect to fresh beef and veal, but with reference to all of the edible products from cattle we have for a portion of the time, at least, been on an exporting basis.

If both cattle and cattle products are combined, even though all of the inedible parts are excluded, we are still on an importing basis.

In view of the various questions that may be raised in this manner, it would seem advisable to amend the law so as to give the corporation the power, in its discretion, to declare an emergency, even though at the exact time we may not be on a strictly exporting basis. Whether such an amendment is necessary or not, it would at least be advisable, as it would remove all doubt as to the power of the corporation to act under the circumstances.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. It seems that down in that department they are somewhat like the old country school-teacher was when he was asked whether he taught that the world was round or square and he replied that he taught it both ways. I want to say to my colleague that I have some figures which I placed in the RECORD from the same department, showing that in 1923 we exported 39,000,000 pounds of beef and veal and that we imported only 19,000,000, giving us an export surplusage over imports of about 20,000,000 pounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I ask that my colleague may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Of course we only export a very few cattle and hogs because we have not any place to send them except to Mexico and Canada.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is true.

Mr. HUDSPETH. But, as I understand this law, it applies to beef and veal and pork.

Mr. JONES. Yes; it does apply to beef and veal and pork. I will say that my figures are taken from the original census figures which were printed, and they were rechecked and are taken from the original figures. But whether the figures furnished my colleague are correct, or whether those furnished me are correct, the fact that remains with reference to this matter is that this bill, if those administering it have the power to declare the emergency, will cover cattle and cattle products; but as it is worded, there is at least some doubt as to whether they could declare the emergency on those commodities regardless of what the price might be, unless we were at the very time on an exporting basis; that is, unless we were exporting more than we were importing. There is some ground for argument they could act anyway, but I have prepared an amendment, which I will offer when we come to that point, to the effect that if we are on an exporting basis or if, in the judgment of those in charge of the corporation, it would materially enhance the price to export a portion of the commodity—in either event, if the price is below the ratio price—the emergency can be declared. If the bill is going to be passed, I think it ought to carry that amendment, because I do not think there ought to be any chance of some export company coming in after the corporation has gone to work and knocking the thing out on the ground that there was no authority to declare the emergency.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question on that very point so that I may understand his viewpoint. Suppose we were not exporting a pound of cattle or a pound of hogs—I am talking about live hogs and live cattle—but were exporting some of their products; could this corporation then under the law declare an emergency as to live cattle and live hogs?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so as the bill is worded now; at least, there is considerable doubt as to that. They could declare it on the food products.

Mr. DENISON. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. JONES. But I think not on the live animal. I think that is the more plausible construction. That is the reason I expect to offer an amendment.

Mr. DENISON. If they could only declare it as to the food products and not as to the live animals, then the ratio price would be fixed for those who handle the food products and not for the farmer, is not that true?

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is what I am trying to cure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think this discussion has proceeded until we have agreed upon one point—that the farmers need relief. We are all agreed on that. I think, too, we have gone so far in this discussion as to agree to another point, and that is that the principle underlying the McNary-Haugen bill is fair; that it simply puts agriculture on the same basis as other lines of industry in the country.

The next point is, is the plan in the McNary-Haugen bill practical and is it workable? That is where we are, and some of you are on the fence. I am sure of that from the discussion that I have had with some of the Members. I think the greatest difficulty that we have encountered in the debate was from the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin on the first evening when he raised the question about the hogs. I have been able to answer his argument in my own mind to my perfect satisfaction. I think some Members would like to have me state how I explain that to myself.

The gentleman from Wisconsin stated that this bill would work all right with wheat. I understood him to make that statement, but he said it would not work with hogs. He said if the bill went into effect it would raise the price of hogs from 7 cents to 11 cents; he was a farmer raising hogs and he would immediately increase the number of hogs that he would raise four times, and, therefore, we would have an enormous oversupply of hogs. Now, let us see if he could do that. I do not know how big his farm is, but it does not make any difference. He could not increase the number of hogs unless he increased the feed in the same proportion. Any farmer knows that. He might go out and buy the feed, but if he does he reduces the raising of the hogs by somebody else.

During the war we had a higher price on hogs than we had on milk, and we had a higher price on hogs than we had on wheat; we had a higher price on hogs than we had on anything, because they wanted hogs. And, gentlemen, you never got as many hogs as you wanted. Why? Because you could not get the feed. The price of feed went higher than the price of hogs. All of you know that you could not buy corn, put it into hogs, and make a profit. The corn was on a basis of 21 cents a pound for hogs, and hogs were worth 17 cents. Therefore there was a loss, and it stood that way for a long time. So I say that if the gentleman from Wisconsin increased his hogs four times, he would have to increase the feed in proportion, and that is impossible.

Mr. BURTNESS. What about the buildings?

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Yes; at the same time he would have to increase his buildings on the farm. Another thing, and I know from experience, for I handle a good many farms and have hogs on all of them——

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. I will.

Mr. MURPHY. I am curious to know when there is no market, when there are no hogs exported on foot, how will this corporation fix the price that will be of any benefit. I can readily see where it will be for the benefit of the packer or the man that manufactures hog products, but my mind does not grasp the situation where if he raises four times as many hogs, where he is going to get off. Hogs and cattle are supposed to be benefited under the bill, and if we do not export hogs and cattle as hogs and cattle, where are we going to get any benefit for hogs and cattle raised in Ohio?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I think I will come to an answer to the gentleman as I proceed; I want to continue what I was saying. In raising hogs you have to put the amount of stock on a farm that fits the farm. I think all of you farmers will agree with me on that. The ordinary farm has about one man and nine sows on a diversified farm.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. If I understand the bill correctly, there has got to be an exporting surplus before the bill can be applied. That is only one of the conditions on which the provisions of the bill may be applied, but it is not the only provision. The other provision is that the price of the article has got below the ratio price.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. And the word "and" is in there and not the word "or," so that both of the provisions must apply.

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. I will come to that directly. As I say, an ordinary man will handle about nine sows successfully. If you multiply it by 4 or by 2, I find by actual experience that you do not raise much more swine than you would with 9 or 10 sows on the farm.

Now we come to the next point—and perhaps we shall answer the gentleman from Ohio—made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT]. He said there was a time when 85,000 hogs came into the Chicago market in one day. He had a hypothetical case, one which was entirely imaginary, in which the packers would only use 50,000 hogs out of the 85,000, and he imagined that 35,000 would be left for export, with the five packers in Chicago taking this position with the corporation: That they would not allow over 4 cents a pound for these surplus hogs. I want to say, in the first place, that what would really happen in this case was what did actually happen. All the hogs were taken. That is what will happen again; but suppose this ridiculous situation of his does occur, and the packers say that they will not pay more than 4 cents a pound. Do you not know that the farmers of the country would send in wires for carloads of those hogs at 4 cents a pound and that the packers would not be able to get a hog? There is not anyone here who would not take them at 4 cents and then 30 days later sell them at 11 cents.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Every day the packers are competing in Chicago and other places against buyers who are just as numerous as they are.

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. The gentleman from Wisconsin gave the House the impression that there were but five packers, and that there was not anybody else buying hogs and packing them for export. There are 267 packers in the United States who handle 60 per cent of the products, and there are 1,700 other packers in the United States who handle the other 40 per cent. We are not yet down to the place where we have to get on our knees to four or five packers. Only 10 per cent of the hog products of the United States is exported. And I want to say to you that in Ohio we can take that 10 per cent of all of the pork produced and pack it in Ohio ready for export with the facilities that we have there now, if there is a corporation of the Government that comes to us and says, "Here is a profitable business; you can make a profit in this and we want you to do it." I believe that covers the point that I had in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Has general authority been given to print and extend remarks on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to know whether that will include an extension of remarks in opposition to the so-called Black amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that unanimous consent has been granted to extend remarks in relation to the bill or any germane amendment thereto, and no question was raised as to the germaneness of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. Can more than one section be offered at this time?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this strikes out all after the word "assembled" in the first section, and it is a substitute for the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it a substitute for the entire bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. It is; and if it should be adopted, then it would be in order to move to strike out the other paragraphs of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. And the gentleman's motion is to strike out the first section and substitute this in its place?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Yes. It is the same proposition that was passed on here once this afternoon. It is just like the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment to strike out the first section, a substitute for the bill, and gives notice that if his substitute is agreed to he will afterwards move to strike out the subsequent sections of the bill.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman to state that it is the Rainey amendment which was offered a while ago.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; he just announced that it was the same parliamentary situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman is adopting the same procedure that the gentleman from Illinois did, not that it is the same amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SANDERS of Texas offers the following amendment: Page 1, line 2, after the word "assembled," strike out the remainder of the section and insert the following:

"That the short title of this act shall be 'The agricultural export corporation and trading act.'

"SEC. 2. When used in this act the term 'person' includes partnerships, corporations, associations, cooperative organizations of producers, cooperative organizations of consumers, and municipal corporations, as well as individuals.

"SEC. 3. "SEC. 4. That the capital stock of the corporation shall be $100,000,000, all of which shall be subscribed by the United States of America, and such subscription shall be subject to call upon the vote of two-thirds of the board of directors of the corporation at such time or times as may be deemed advisable; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of making payment upon such subscriptions when and as called. Receipts for payments by the United States of America for or on account of such stock shall be issued by the corporation to the Secretary of the Treasury and shall be evidence of stock ownership.

"SEC. 5. That the management of the corporation shall be vested in a board of directors, consisting of three members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The term of office of members of said board shall be eight years, but in the first appointments made under this act, one director shall be appointed for four years, one for six years, and one for eight years, and thereafter appointments shall be made for eight years: Provided, That in case of the appointment of any member of said board to fill a vacancy the appointment shall be made for the unexpired term. The member of said board, except in appointments made to fill a vacancy, having the shortest term to serve shall be the chairman thereof. No director, officer, attorney, agent, or employee of the corporation shall in any manner, directly or indirectly, participate in the determination of any question affecting his personal interests or the interest of any corporation, partnership, or association in which he is directly or indirectly interested; and each director shall devote his time to the business of the corporation. Before entering upon his duties each of the directors so appointed and each officer shall take oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office. Any member of said board of directors can be removed from office at any time by concurrent resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives.

"SEC. 6. That the directors of the corporation appointed as hereinbefore provided shall receive annual salaries, payable monthly, of $10,000.

"SEC. 7. That the principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but the board of directors shall have power to establish agencies or branch offices in any place in the United States and in foreign countries.

"SEC. 8. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal; to make contracts; to purchase or lease and hold or dispose of such real estate as may be necessary for the prosecution of its business; to sue and be sued; to complain and defend in any court of competent jurisdiction, State or Federal; to appoint, by its board of directors, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are necessary for the transaction of the business of the corporation, to define their duties, require bonds of them, and fix the penalties thereof and to dismiss at pleasure such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents; and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised: Provided, That in the appointment or promotion of any such officers and employees, attorneys, or agents, the board shall give no consideration whatever to the politics of such persons, but all such appointments and promotions, as well as all other business of the corporation, shall be conducted and transacted entirely on a nonpartisan basis.

"SEC. 9. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized (1) to lease and operate elevators and storage warehouses; (2) to buy agricultural products from any person within the United States, and to sell such products to any person within the United States, and to any person or to any government or subdivision of government without the United States; (3) to act as agent of any person producing or dealing in agricultural products, either in their natural or prepared state, within the United States, in the sale of such products either within or without the United States; and (4) to make advances for the purpose of assisting any person in financing the sale, or exportation and sale, of such agricultural products, but in no case shall any of the money so advanced be expended without the United States. Every such advance, and any sale of such products made on time, shall be secured by adequate security of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors. It is hereby declared to be the object and purpose of this act to provide a market for the sale of agricultural products, and to eliminate as far as possible the commissions and charges that are exacted upon agricultural products from the time such products leave the producer until the same reach the consumer, and to thereby increase the price which the producer receives and decrease the price which the consumer pays.

"SEC. 10. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time its bonds in an amount aggregating not more than five times its paid-in capital. Such bonds shall mature not more than 10 years from the respective dates of issue, and shall bear such rate of interest as shall be fixed by the board of directors with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The bonds may be offered for sale publicly or to any person at such price or prices as the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may determine.

"SEC. 11. That the net earnings of the corporation not required for its operation shall be accumulated as a reserve until such time as such reserve amounts to $100,000,000; and thereafter all the net earnings of the corporation not required for the redemption of any of its bonds shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States until such payments equal the amount advanced by the United States for the capital stock of the corporation.

"SEC. 12. That any and all bonds issued by the corporation shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes, and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess-profits and war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States, upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, corporations, or associations. The interest on an amount of such bonds the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000 owned by any individual, partnership, corporation, or association, shall be exempt from the taxes referred to in clause (b). The corporation, including its franchise and the capital and reserve or surplus thereof, and the income derived therefrom, shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or any local taxing authority, except that any real property of the corporation shall be subject to State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed.

"SEC. 13. That whoever makes any statement, knowing it to be false, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for any other person any advance under this act, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

"Whoever willfully overvalues any security by which any such advance is secured shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

"Whoever (1) falsely makes, forges, or counterfeits any bond, coupon, or paper in imitation of or purporting to be in imitation of a bond or coupon issued by the corporation; or (2) passes, utters, or publishes, or attempts to pass, utter, or publish any false, forged, or counterfeited bond, coupon, or paper purporting to be issued by the corporation, knowing the same to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited; or (3) falsely alters any such bond, coupon, or paper; or (4) passes, utters, or publishes as true any falsely altered or spurious bond, coupon, or paper issued or purporting to have been issued by the corporation, knowing the same to be falsely altered or spurious, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 14. That whoever, being connected in any capacity with the corporation, (1) embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any moneys, funds, or credits thereof, or (2) with intent to defraud the corporation or any person, or to deceive any officer of the corporation (a) makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the corporation, or (b) without authority from the directors, draws any order or assigns any note, bond, draft, mortgage, judgment, or decree thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

"The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to direct and use the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department to detect, arrest, and deliver into the custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction any person committing any of the offenses punishable under this section.

"SEC. 15. In case of war, or when in the judgment of the President of the United States there is danger of war, any such vessel or vessels so turned over to the corporation shall, upon the demand of the President of the United States, be immediately returned to the Government of the United States."

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane. This substitute is open to the same objections that were lodged against the substitute offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL]. In the first place, this substitute is not for the purpose of meeting the present emergency, as is clearly the purpose of the McNary-Haugen bill, but it is permanent legislation. In the second place, it is clearly a marketing bill, as is shown on page 5, beginning at line 13, in which it is declared to be the object and purpose of the act to provide a market for the sale of agricultural products, and so forth, with the avowed purpose of increasing the price which the producer receives and decreasing the price which the consumer pays. Certainly that is a very laudable purpose, but it clearly demonstrates that it is a marketing bill. Section 12 also provides for tax-exempt securities, which is contrary to the McNary-Haugen bill, which provides that these securities shall not be exempt. Section 15 authorizes the President to turn over vessels without charge for the use of the corporation.

Mr. RAKER. As I understand it that is not included in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 15 is not a part of the amendment.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. I did not follow the reading of the bill. If any loss is incurred, does this amendment contemplate a recovery from the Treasury or by means as is suggested in the McNary-Haugen bill through the producers themselves?

Mr. TINCHER. This is the Norris-Sinclair bill, and it makes the Treasury stand all of the loss.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that whatever losses are incurred would come out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. TINCHER. Well, the Clerk read on page 9 "in case of war or when in the judgment of the President of the United States there was danger of war, any such vessel or vessels turned over to the corporation," and so forth.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. In the amendment—I do not know whether the Clerk read it or not—section 15, page 9, I had it marked out. If it is not stricken out, I intend to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas on the point of order.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, both these bills are marketing bills. Both of them deal in large measure with the exportable surplus of basic farm products. Both of them provide for organizing a corporation to handle such products.

It is true that the plan by which they go about it is a little different. But the main purposes of the two bills are practically the same, or at least strike at the same problems. As to the question in reference to section 15, that section has been eliminated. The question as to tax-free bonds is not an important question. On the question of the parliamentary status of the two bills it is an incidental question whether the bonds shall be tax free or tax exempt. As a matter of fact in this bill the bonds are not tax free; they are subject only to certain taxes. But that is not an important matter. The main purposes of the bill, as set out here in section 9, are:

To lease and operate elevators and storage warehouses.

That is practically the same as the bill which is under discussion.

To buy agricultural products from any person within the United States, and to sell such products to any person within the United States and to any person or to any government or subdivision of government without the United States.

Now, this bill under consideration has the same purposes. They have authority to buy these products and sell them abroad at world prices or to sell them within this country at not less than the ratio price. Those powers are in both bills. I read further.

To act as agent of any person producing or dealing in agricultural products, either in their natural or prepared state—

And so forth.

As I remember the bill under consideration it authorized the corporation to assist persons or organizations, as this one does, under subdivision 4, which says:

To make advances for the purpose of assisting any person in financing the sale or exportation and sale of such agricultural products.

And so forth.

And it seems to me, the main purpose of the bill that we are now considering being the same as the main purpose of the measure my colleague offers, that it would be in order as a substitute. Of course, it has not exactly the same provisions because if they were there would be no point in offering a substitute. I am not now discussing the merits of either bill. But it seems to me that the question of whether one is germane to the other depends almost altogether upon the main purposes of the two bills, and no man can gainsay the fact that the bills have the same main purposes.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, it is clearly permanent legislation and section 9 contemplates building, buying, leasing, and operating elevators and storage warehouses and to put the Government in the business as a permanent policy, which is not in line with the purpose of the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. BLACK of New York. If the Chair will hear me, it seems to me this substitute is out of order, because it is a substitute not only for the McNary-Haugen bill as an original proposition but for that portion of the McNary-Haugen bill that purports to be a preamble. Now, the first section of the McNary-Haugen bill is divided into two parts. The first part is the preamble. I understand a preamble legislatively is a compilation of the evidence before the final deliberative body on which it predicates its action. But here you substitute legislation for a statement of facts, and I believe that on that ground alone that this proposition offered as a substitute for the bill containing a statement of facts is clearly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS] seeks to effect the same general purpose as the bill in question—that is, to relieve the agricultural situation. It is true, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], that the mere fact that there is to an extent a departure from the bill under consideration does not make it out of order because otherwise there would be no necessity of offering a substitute or amendment of any kind. However, it is not possible to offer a substitute for a bill which undertakes to give the same relief and yet departs entirely from the method of the bill under consideration. The Haugen bill, under consideration, is an emergency measure and merely gives power to investigate and determine when a special emergency exists with reference to any one of the enumerated agricultural products, and then the corporation having certain definite powers comes into action and by means of control of exportable surplus relieves the situation. This substitute is permanent legislation, giving the Government power to buy and sell farm products. While the ultimate object is to relieve agriculture, it embraces a method that does not come within the rules of the House in reference to germaneness to the bill under consideration, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. HAUGEN. May we have another section read?

Mr. BURTNESS. If I may have recognition on the other section.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. BURTNESS. My request is to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a day or two ago the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] called your attention to a very important chart, a graph which you will find in the RECORD on page 9204, and which shows conclusively the present relationship of the price of agricultural products now as compared with 1913 with various forms of labor. This is important, for it indicates not only the trend in the increased cost of producing farm products, but it also shows the ability of labor in general to pay fair prices for them.

Starting with all items covered by the graph at a normal basis of 100 in the year 1913, we find that the price of agricultural products is now on a basis of about 118, while farm labor is on a basis of about 152. In other words, farm labor has increased 52 per cent, but agricultural prices only 18 per cent, since 1913.

But what about other wages entering into the cost of commodities or service which farmers must buy? On the same basis, railroad labor stands to-day at about 186, union labor outside of railroad labor at about 200, and labor in the factories of New York at about 220.

I desire now to call your attention to another chart, and it is one which depicts graphically the purchasing power of farm products and of nonagricultural products:

Starting out with 1913 again as the pre-war normal basis [indicating on chart], you will note that the black line indicates the purchasing power of agricultural products in terms of nonfarm products; the dotted red line indicates the purchasing power of nonagricultural products in terms of farm products. In 1913 you note farm products commenced to rise as compared with others, so that there was some difference there for about two years; that is, farm products in the terms of other products had during that time a slight advantage as compared with the 1913 normal. Then the lines crossed in 1915—toward the latter part of 1915—and for a while, as compared with 1913 conditions, the products which were nonagricultural had an advantage over agricultural products as compared with 1913. In any event, from 1913 to 1919. The lines crossed and recrossed, as they ought to do under normal conditions, until we reached the latter part of the year 1919. During this time, from 1913 to 1919, I submit, gentlemen, that the economic laws operated in such a way that there was no advantage to one of these classes of commodities as against the other, but that they did just exactly what you expect to happen in normal times through the ups and downs of the various markets.

But then what happened? In 1919 agricultural products took an enormous drop not only in price but also in their purchasing power of nonagricultural products, with the result that in 1921, as shown by this graph, nonagricultural products were up to the basis of approximately 150 while agricultural products had fallen to a basis less than 70; in other words, a difference there of about 80 points. And what has been the result since then? Why, if times had been somewhere nearly normal you would have seen these lines recross again. That is what they did back in 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918. Of course, there was not the great variance during those years that developed in 1919. Since then, however, one year has gone by, two, three, and four years have passed, and you still find a difference between the lines of from 60 to 70 points, with practically no indication whatsoever that these lines are going to converge or get together again. Why, if you will extend the lines as set out here on the basis of the almost imperceptible convergence that has taken place during the last four years you will find that you would probably reach 1935 or possibly 1940 before these two lines would get together or recross.

Now, that is the exact situation; and what has happened under these conditions? Why, there is not anything peculiar about what has happened in the agricultural section when this is the situation with which they have been confronted for almost five years.

Of course, we have had hard times, bank failures, and general distress throughout those vast portions of the country dependent upon agricultural products. But let me remind you of this: That this graph indicates the situation with reference to agricultural prices in general, including such crops as cotton and wool, which have been selling above the ratio price. When this [indicating] is the situation with reference to the average of agricultural products, including those I have already suggested and others which have fortunately received fair prices, such as dairy products, then what do you suppose could have happened to those communities throughout this country which are engaged primarily in the raising of such agricultural products as wheat, hogs, and livestock, the prices for which are not even anywhere nearly up to the basis of the price of agricultural products in general?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Gladly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Who prepared that chart? Where did the chart come from?

Mr. BURTNESS. This chart was prepared from figures furnished by the Department of Agriculture. It was prepared by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics in that department. It is based upon official figures.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. I prefer not to yield now.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I wanted to know whether the gentleman had the consent of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to bring the chart into the House.

Mr. BURTNESS. He made no objection to it. But let us proceed to the facts as to some of the results.

Now, gentlemen, we have talked about bank failures more or less during this debate and some have suggested that the bank failures have all taken place in two or three States, such as Montana and the Dakotas. That is not the fact at all. I will insert in my remarks a table showing the bank failures, both national and State, from 1870 up to the fiscal year ending July 1, 1923.

I want, however, to call your attention to the fact that in 1917, for instance, there were only 7 national bank failures; in 1918, 2; in 1919, 1; in 1920, 5; in 1921, 28; in 1922, 33; and in 1923, 37. The ratio of State bank failures is about the same, although greater in number.

Now, what has happened since July 1, 1923? During the present fiscal year I find we have had a total of 123 national bank failures. In the State of Minnesota—and that is a highly diversified State, with the exception of about 2 congressional districts out of the 10—there were 6 bank failures and they were large banks, as well as being national banks. In Kansas there were 4; in New Mexico, 12; South Dakota, 15; Nebraska, 7; North Dakota, 18; Oklahoma, 16; Montana, 22, and so on. The list, which I trust you will all read, will show that these failures have occurred in other portions of the country also, but not to the same extent that they have occurred in the great plains section. From the information which the Comptroller of the Currency possesses as to State bank failures, not claimed to be complete, it appears that the number of State bank failures since July 1, last, is 311.

The history of this country has never shown a situation of that sort. Prior to this time the greatest number of bank failures occurred in the fiscal year ending July 1, 1893, but even during that year the total was but a fraction of those of this fiscal year, or, to be exact, 65 national banks and 261 State banks. The tables referred to are as follows:

Let me give you a little illustration of what happens under such conditions as indicated in the graph. I have here the daily record put out by an abstractor in Bottineau County, N. Dak., showing the transfers filed on one day, April 5, 1924, and what does it show? Nine sheriff's deeds issued upon foreclosure of mortgages and in our State a sheriff's deed is not issued until after the period of the year of redemption has gone by. Let me read one or two typical items:

Albert Martin, by sheriff, to Capital Trust & Savings Bank, sheriff's certificate, $2,797.20.

David Lundy, by sheriff, to Fidelity Mutual Life Insurance Co., sheriff's certificate, $8,279.41—

And so on. What story do these tell?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTNESS. The items read and others indicate that the grantees in these sheriff's deeds are life insurance companies, banks in the East, and concerns of that sort. What does that mean? It means that three or four or five years prior to the issuance of these sheriff's deeds the amount represented by the mortgage did not exceed 30 or 40 per cent of the value of the land, and it means that within this period of time the equity of from 60 to 70 per cent of the farmers who owned the land has been wiped out. It means that these families who lived upon these nine farms in that one county alone were forced on one day during the first part of April of this year to move away from their home. There are countless others in like condition.

Is there any wonder that we get telegrams such as this one which I received a couple of days ago:

Nelson County Old Settlers' Association, having as its membership 75 per cent of the farmers of the county, 50 per cent of whom are the original settlers of this county, urge that the Congress, regardless of party, get solidly behind the McNary-Haugen bill and see to it that it is passed before Congress adjourns. These pioneers of the Northwest wish to convey to the Members of Congress from the East the sad fact that after 40 years of labor and hardships in opening up this country they are now fighting with their backs to the wall trying to redeem their homesteads. The defeat of this bill will be an official notice from Congress to these old-timers that they have served their usefulness on this side of the Canadian line and that the Peace River country is still open.

Now, are you, by your acts, going to contribute to the sending out of the United States of America and to foreign soil, up into the Peace River country in Canada, a large number of the people who have tried to build up this country? I can not for the life of me believe that you are going to do so.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The Dominion of Canada does not have any guarantee of prices such as sought to be established by this bill.

Mr. BURTNESS. No; but they have a considerable amount of free land, land still virgin soil, and they offer, as the gentleman knows or ought to know, all sorts of inducements to the immigrant and they have agents scattered all over the Northwestern States giving prospects the lowest kind of immigrant rates and easy settlement terms, telling them of low freight rates on grain because of Government subsidy and everything of that sort, so as to induce them to come in, and many of them will be led away by these promises even though they may not fare so well after they get up there.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But the price of wheat is lower in Canada than in the United States.

Mr. BURTNESS. That is not correct——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Except in part. On certain kinds of wheat it is lower than it is in the United States, but not lower than the American price of winter wheat. But gentlemen ought to realize that the cost of production up there, with practically no taxes to pay, with no interest items to pay, and with larger yields, will, of course, be considerably less per bushel. But we will have an opportunity to hear from the Chicago Board of Trade a little later.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, no.

Mr. BURTNESS. So I do not expect to yield to the gentleman much more just now.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a correction of his own statement?

Mr. BURTNESS. I will when I have made a few more observations on this bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. You want to let that statement stand as correct?

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, if the gentleman is so particular about it, I will be glad to have him make his correction.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman that I offered what I considered a proper inquiry, and I am a Member of this House, and I can see no occasion for any observation that the gentleman from Illinois represents anybody particularly any more than does the gentleman from North Dakota, who, of course, understands the situation.

Mr. BURTNESS. I recognize that the gentleman from Illinois is one of the valuable Members of this House, but I also recognize the fact that we note here that every person representing such places as Minneapolis, Duluth, Baltimore, and Chicago, where the organized grain and milling interests and exporters are gathered together—at least we see most of such representatives pretty active in trying to defeat this bill in spite of the contention of the men who seem to be working with them, such as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] and others who are trying to tell us that this happens to be a millers' bill or a packers' bill or the elevator companies' bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has again expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the floor.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Dakota be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURTNESS. Let us now see just what this bill is in effect. I contend that we, the proponents of the bill, are standing here upon the principle that it is absolutely nothing more than a converse application of the protective tariff, and that the only difference between the protective tariff and the application of this bill, or rather the legislative guide set out in this bill, is that the protective tariff takes into consideration the difference in the cost of production in the United States and abroad, whereas this bill has for practical convenience adopted, because it is an easier way to get at it, the ratio price several times explained to you in this discussion. The Tariff Commission, and upon its recommendation the President, just recently found, as a matter of fact, that the difference in the cost of production of wheat in the United States and abroad over a three-year period is 42 cents per bushel. The ratio price that will be paid on wheat upon the adoption of this bill is substantially that same amount above the world's market, taking into consideration transportation costs to such market. Congress itself in granting a tariff on wheat has in effect said that the American producer is entitled to protection in our domestic markets against competition from abroad; that the American wheat farmer ought to receive the world's market price plus the tariff duty. The same is true in a general way as to other farm products, and particularly as to other products specifically mentioned in this bill. The tariff on cattle ranges from 1½ cents to 2 cents per pound. The approximate amount of present prices must be increased at the Chicago market to reach the ratio price as contemplated in the bill.

True, the increase on hogs would be some greater than the tariff rate, but on the whole contemplated increases conform very nearly to present tariff schedules. So after all while a little different guide has been adopted in this bill, namely, the ratio price, yet the result is the same. It took the Tariff Commission six months to investigate and find out what the difference is in the cost of producing just one commodity—wheat—here and in Canada. How much more practical, therefore, in an emergency is the adoption of the ratio price? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] brings in an emergency bill as a substitute for this one that would make it necessary for somebody to find out the difference in cost of production accurately before his bill could go into effect, and he limits the operation thereof to one year. While I am not opposed to the principles of the Rainey bill it is plainly impractical as compared with the Haugen bill. Now, why do I say this bill is the converse application of the tariff? You all admit that the determining factor in the price of crops or commodities, of which we have an exportable surplus, is the price in the world's market. There are, however, exceptions; and what are they? Any business that is properly organized, a private concern, or many private concerns organized together, producing farm machinery or anything else within this country, can maintain a domestic price upon its products and sell their surplus output at a lower price in the foreign markets without in any way interfering with the price here. Permit me to make the application of this bill plain: If you or I, or any private corporation or a cooperative association owned all the wheat or all the pork in this country, what could we do? We could do exactly the same thing as organized industry can do in spite of the exportable surplus. We would sell the exportable surplus abroad at the world's price, and then we would say that the difference established by the tariff is so much and that the American consumers would have to pay us the world price plus the tariff, plus the cost of transporting the crops of products over here, and, of course, we would get such price. It would be simply good business to do so.

Now, with all the wheat of the United States scattered over 40 States and all the hogs scattered over the 48 States, the farmers can not organize to that degree, no matter how many bills you pass to encourage cooperative market associations. So, what are we asking you in this emergency? We are simply asking the Government to establish for the farmers what they can not do for themselves, so they may accomplish what they could do for themselves if it was possible for them to organize; that is, to establish at their expense a governmental agency, a corporation by which they can get rid of the exportable surplus for the world's price, that surplus we can not sell in the United States, and then get the full benefit of the tariff on that portion sold for domestic consumption. In other words, make the tariff schedule on crops with exportable surpluses a tariff duty which you, in your legislative wisdom, have said we are entitled to; make that duty fully operative in the same sense and to the same effect that the tariff on wool, on flax, on textiles, on cutlery, and on hundreds of other articles is operative. By operative I mean, of course, reflected in the price. Yet there are men here whom we find in the Halls of Congress usually working so hard to get high tariff rates on articles produced or manufactured in their States but refusing to go with us on this proposition. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has again expired.

Mr. BURTNESS. Under the right to extend my remarks, I desire to reply to the argument made by many on the floor to the effect that the enactment of this bill will grant colossal profits overnight to the packers, the flour mills, and elevator concerns. No further argument should be needed than to mention what all of you know, that the organized grain and flour trade and the packers are bitterly fighting the measure, presumably for the reason that its enactment will interfere with some of their present profits. Be that as it may, let us ascertain what the actual facts are.

It is inevitable that legislation elevating prices should give a profit that is unearned to holders of any commodity favorably affected by legislation. This is not confined to the McNary-Haugen bill. Every tariff bill that the Congress of the United States has ever passed has had important price effects. Anyone desiring to discover the true extent of price elevation need only consult the records of the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means and data from other sources to find that the McKinley tariff bill, the Payne Act, the Underwood law, and the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922 all produced similar effects, except that in the case of the Underwood law instead of prices advancing and instead of importers rushing in supplies in advance of the taking effect of the tariff imports tended to fall off.

Such efforts are not confined to tariff bills. There is under consideration an amendment to the Constitution that would do away with tax-exempt securities. Undoubtedly when, if ever, this amendment is on the point of adoption investors will load up with these tax-exempt securities, thus doing exactly the similar thing that happens when the tariff law is passed and what will happen in the case of the enactment of the McNary-Haugen bill.

The minority of the Committee on Agriculture of the House states:

> Every merchant or wholesaler who has flour on hand will find himself enriched overnight and under the terms of the bill no equalization fee can be collected.

This sounds like a terrible indictment of the bill, but what are the facts as to wheat flour? The stocks reported on hand as of April 1 were only 2,186,000 barrels, and these are scattered in tens of thousands of ownerships. If a ratio price increase in value were applied to this quantity of flour these tens of thousands of holders would be enriched to the extent of considerably less than $4,000,000.

The minority further says:

> Hundreds of millions worth of pork, beef, and mutton in the hands of the Big Five and about 200 smaller packers would instantly rise in value.

The picture is likewise overpainted with respect to beef and mutton. These move constantly and currently into consumption. In the case of beef, the amount in cold storage on May 1 was approximately 7,800,000 pounds, which, had the ratio increased in value, would have advanced about $1,500,000.

The minority report goes on to state with reference to the colossal profits of the Big Five and the small packers:

> On this item alone there would be a sheer gift to the meat packers of this country of from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000, to be paid for by the consumers of the country.

This statement is made with a certainty that would seem to brook no contradiction. As a matter of fact it is more than likely that only a fraction of any increase in the price of raw material will be transmitted as far as the consumer. A large part of any increase in the price of hogs, beef, or in other products named in this bill should be absorbed without being passed on to the consumer. The receding cost of raw material was not passed on to the consumer; why should all of any new increase be passed on? Only in the cost of two products will there be an unearned price increase worthy of note.

These two cases are wheat and pork. Based on the amount of pork in storage in all of its forms on May 1, and assuming that with one stroke all prices would advance to the ratio price—which, of course, is not admitted—the addition to the value of the 905,000,000 pounds of pork reported would have been $54,000,000. In other words, instead of an increase of from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000, to be paid for by the consumers of the country, as the minority report says, if every penny of the advances were passed on the additional cost would be from one-third to one-fourth what the minority states.

There are at least two points to be borne in mind in this connection. In the first place, later, when the emergency is over, the enterprises that show profit at the beginning of the operation of the law may lose some of that profit when it ceases to operate. Furthermore, on January 1, 1924, the farmers of the United States had 65,500,000 swine on their farms, according to the estimate of the Department of Agriculture. It is the farmer that this bill is trying to help, and not the packer. If some relatively small benefit should come to the packer because of its passage, it should not be permitted to be an argument of any force whatsoever against extending the relief to the farmer. It will do no harm to remember, likewise, that in the year 1921 alone the Big Five, who, according to the minority, are to benefit so enormously from this bill, in spite of their opposition to it, lost $61,000,000.

In the case of wheat the stock is constantly diminishing, and should Congress pass this legislation at this session it will go in force at that time of the year when the wheat stocks are at their very lowest—in other words, the best time of the year, all things considered.

The amount of wheat in country mills and elevators on March 1, which has been constantly diminishing, plus the visible supply usually reported as of May 10, was 131,500,000 bushels. Estimating an average increase of value for all grades of 40 cents per bushel, the increase on the whole would be approximately $52,500,000.

It is a mistake to assume that all of this benefit is going to accrue to millers holding country wheat and elevator owners. Large quantities of this wheat are owned by growers who actually hold the warehouse receipts for it. Furthermore, nearly 20 per cent of the stock is estimated to be in the hands or ownership of farmers' cooperative grain organizations, and, still further, there is back on American farms possibly as much as 60,000,000 bushels that will participate immediately in the benefit of the advance in value, and in less than a month—in fact, before this bill can possibly be put into effect—the new crop will begin to move.

Assume an average crop of 750,000,000 bushels over the next five years. This will mean that the farmer, during the life of the bill as written, will market approximately 3,750,000,000 bushels of wheat. Shall we deny him the common justice of a fair exchange value merely because there is a small advantage, relatively speaking, to present holders of grain?

Finally, the minority has stated in order to make the picture as black as possible:

> The total gift to nonproducers would easily amount to $500,000,000. There has been no such gift "since salvation was made free to the human race."

This estimate is wholly unjustified. Applying a carefully estimated increase in value per unit to wheat, wheat flour, beef, pork, miscellaneous meats, and corn on hand for various days the total estimated increase is slightly more than $121,000,000. The total for the six commodities will be less than the minimum that would accrue to the meat packers alone as claimed in the minority report.

A study of the table submitted will show how the opposition to this measure is grasping at straws. The table has been prepared by the Bureau of Economics of the Department of Agriculture and gives the source of the estimates, as well as the reasons for certain calculations.

Estimated increase in value of stated commodities in dealers' hands under provisions of the McNary-Haugen bill

The benefits the act will confer upon American agriculture are, however, more material and may well be compared to the incidental benefits to others. Careful computations, based on the best available information, and covering only 19 of the States in the Union—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Texas, Oklahoma, Kentucky, Tennessee, Montana, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, and California—indicate that had the bill been an act during 1923 it would have added approximately $1,000,000,000 to the income of the farmers of these States. That income would have increased their purchasing power to that extent and would have been in turn distributed to almost every portion of this great Nation. Rehabilitate agriculture in these States where depression now exists and you will benefit every section of the country.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "emergency" in line 8 of the section that has been read. Mr. Chairman, every member of the committee knows that I have taken no time and no part in the discussion up to this moment. I do not pretend to be an expert on this subject or, in fact, upon any other subject; there are some things I know something about. I know something about the cost of living to the consumer. I know something about the 400,000 people living in my district who have to buy every pound of food they eat. I know something about the requirements of the working men in the city who have to buy the products of the farm.

Now, my very good friend from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS], who just left the floor, seemed to take umbrage because I suggested that if his farmer friends moved from the United States to Canada and they were there at this moment they would get a less price for their products in Canada than they do in the United States. He answered by saying that we would later hear from the Chicago Board of Trade. Did that answer anything?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. From the history we have had of the financial conditions and the economic conditions in North and South Dakota I think I would rather follow the Chicago Board of Trade than the two Dakotas.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am not speaking for the Chicago Board of Trade. I would not object to doing that, however, for such exchanges have a right to exist and have important functions to perform and are very important institutions in the marketing of the products of the farm.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If I do not lose all my time.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If it was not for the mills in Minneapolis and the West, the price of grain in the United States would not be in excess of the price in Canada.

Mr. WEFALD. And the farmers could not live, could they? [Laughter.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Those mills are the best customers that the farmers have.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further. I have not yet asked for any time in the discussion of this bill. I have attended all the sessions of the committee as constantly as possible. I have been here for the purpose of getting information, because I realize that such gentlemen as the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], the distinguished chairman of the committee, and others are experts on agricultural matters and know more about the subject than a man born, unfortunately, in the city of Chicago and compelled to live there all his life.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman believe that his consumers in Chicago eat anything on their table that is quite as cheap as their bread, unless, possibly, it is potatoes, which we send down there and get 20 cents a bushel for?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. My constituents in Chicago pay a great deal more for their bread than the farmers up in the gentleman's State receive for their grain or for their flour; but that is another subject.

Mr. BURTNESS. In spite of the conditions, is not the bread they eat the cheapest food that they have on their table, considering the value of it?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think not.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from North Dakota says that his people are receiving only 20 cents a bushel for their potatoes. Will this bill help them any to secure a higher price?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, I can not yield all of my time in order that the gentleman from North Dakota may continue his address. Let us not permit this discussion to degenerate into an attack upon various interests, various sections, and various localities. [Applause.] Let us discuss the principle of the thing, let us discuss its economic effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. You are introducing in this bill a new system of national finance and of political economy in the history of the United States. You are putting the Government more into business than has ever been done before upon any single proposition. You are proposing that the Government shall take hold of one of the great industries of the country, and you will have to have patience with some of us, who have some of the old-fashioned ideas that the law of supply and demand counts for something, that as the law of gravity can not be abrogated by an act of Congress, neither can the law of supply and demand. You will have to forgive us if we are not able to follow you in your proposition that the Government can help the farmer lift himself up by his own boot straps.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, I am going to lose all of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I think the House will give the gentleman all the time that he wants. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that the tariff interferes with the law of supply and demand and that the farmers have been paying tribute to the laboring man and the manufacturer for a hundred years?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. My understanding of the tariff is that it gives just as much protection to the farmer as it does to the city man. Our present tariff protects the prices of the farmer to a greater extent than any tariff law we have ever had heretofore.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That is true; because it is the first tariff that we have ever had that protected the farmer, but it can not protect him on surplus products.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It can not protect him on surplus products; no. The application of the rule of supply and demand can, however. But I rose primarily to move to strike out this word "emergency" as it appears in section 1, and I would like to discuss the section that is before the committee for just a moment. Let me ask the chairman of the committee what is the purpose of the declaration of the emergency? I notice there are two emergencies here, a general emergency and a special emergency. Congress first declares that a general emergency exists, and then the corporation may afterwards declare that a special emergency exists. What is the theory of the committee? Is it that this legislation rests upon an emergency, that declaring an emergency gives Congress jurisdiction?

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman has read the reports, he knows that an emergency exists.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then if there were no emergency, is it the theory of the gentleman that Congress would not have authority to pass this legislation?

Mr. HAUGEN. If there was no emergency, there would be no necessity to declare an emergency.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, the gentleman can not get out of it by evading the question. I am asking him whether he thinks the declaration of an emergency is necessary for the jurisdiction of the Congress to pass this legislation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Not entirely.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then is the declaration of an emergency merely for the purpose of——

Mr. HAUGEN. Simply stating a fact that exists.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, then you are reciting a bit of current history?

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, it is a fact.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What is the purpose of the declaration of a special emergency by the corporation? Is that necessary in the opinion of the distinguished chairman of the committee in order to give Congress jurisdiction to pass this legislation?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh!

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I believe I am speaking to the point, because this first section I am now discussing refers entirely to the different kinds of emergencies. The heading of part 1 is "Emergencies." The heading of this particular section is "General emergency." I find a little later on that the heading of section 2 is "Special emergencies."

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for an answer to this question?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. A general emergency is one following the general condition that exists, a special——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, I believe I understand the difference between general and special, but I want to know the purpose of the declaration of an emergency in this legislation for the RECORD, because it may be important hereafter.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the gentleman mean the special emergencies referred to?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Then that is the period during which the law is to be operated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more, so that I may yield to some one, if there is any gentleman in the House, representing the committee, who can answer the question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I yield to the distinguished ex-governor of Nebraska.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman recalls that all the legislation that empowered the President to carry on the war was based upon the proposition that an emergency existed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is this a war emergency?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; it is a peace emergency. But the emergency is exactly the same with which the President is empowered to deal.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will my friend from South Dakota answer the question?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I will try to answer the question. This bill is bottomed, of course, upon an emergency, and the reason an emergency is set up in this bill in the preamble is because it is believed that would assist in making it constitutional. In my judgment, however, there is no necessity of declaring an emergency of this character in order to make the bill constitutional. It is simply a method of cooperative marketing through Government agency by which the farmer can protect himself. I do not think it is necessary to carry the emergency feature at all. I believe the bill is constitutional without such a provision.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am glad to have the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask that the gentleman have one minute.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I did not want to take more time, but I will yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one minute.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman from Illinois base his argument at all upon any question as to the existence of an emergency?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman frankly that if this bill is based upon an emergency I would like to know whether it is an emergency growing out of the war or whether it is an emergency which may occur at any time in time of peace, because I think if this bill is passed——

Mr. CRAMTON. Then why gum up the RECORD? Why not frankly answer the question? Does not the gentleman from Illinois recognize that there exists an emergency that is very clear, the continuous economic depression in agriculture, and will not the gentleman frankly answer that question, yes or no?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I have not any doubt there is an economic depression in agriculture; I know there is. I want to know whether this legislation is based upon that.

Mr. CRAMTON. And is it not serious enough to constitute an emergency?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may read another section, and after the section is read I shall move that the committee rise unless there are further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. I object.

Mr. HAUGEN. I move to close debate on the section and all amendments thereto.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. SABATH. A division.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 7.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask to withdraw the pro forma motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SPECIAL EMERGENCIES

SEC. 2. (a) If the corporation finds (1) that there is a surplus for export of wheat, flour, rice, corn, wool, cattle, sheep, swine, or any food product of cattle, sheep, or swine, and (2) that, according to estimates made by it, the ratio prices, as defined in section 4, in respect of the commodity would be in excess of the domestic price thereof, it shall immediately notify the President in writing of its findings. Upon such notification from the corporation, it shall be the duty of the President by proclamation to declare that a special emergency exists as to such agricultural commodity.

(b) Whenever the corporation finds that the special emergency conditions no longer exist or are no longer controlling in respect of the agricultural commodity, it shall notify the President in writing of its finding, and it shall be the duty of the President by proclamation to declare that such special emergency is terminated.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. RUBEY. Let me offer this amendment and put it in the RECORD. I will not discuss it but I desire to offer it and let it be pending.

Mr. JONES. I want to offer mine and let it go in the RECORD.

Mr. RUBEY. I will not offer my amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9033, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. ROSENBLOOM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5855. An act to fix the salaries of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force and the fire department of the District of Columbia.

S. 2431. An act conveying to the State of Delaware certain land in the county of Sussex, in that State.

S. J. Res. 89. Joint resolution authorizing and permitting the State of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and use permanent buildings, rifle ranges, and utilities at Camp Pike, Ark., as are necessary for the use and benefit of the National Guard of the State of Arkansas.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL

Mr. ROSENBLOOM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 9192. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

H. R. 6820. An act making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, Mr. WERTZ was granted leave of absence for two days on account of important business.

REVENUE BILL

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I present and send to the desk for printing under the rule the conference report on the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa presents a conference report on the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6715) to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

OPPOSITION TO BLACK AMENDMENT—PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, there have been many bills introduced by Members of Congress which, I understand, are now pending before the Judiciary Committee, all either in the same language or of a like tenor, which have for their purpose the modification of the Volstead Act, providing for an increase of the alcoholic content of any beverage to not more than 2.75 per cent and that it may be manufactured, sold, or transported for sale in original packages.

I am opposed to the increase of this alcoholic content and am in favor of prohibition. I have always favored prohibition. I have lived in what was formerly the Indian Territory, now the eastern part of the State of Oklahoma, all of my life. The Federal law, prior to the admission of Oklahoma to Statehood on November 16, 1907, prohibited the manufacture, introduction, or sale of intoxicating liquor into the Indian Territory. I favored that law, and from time to time opposed any changes which liberalized its provisions.

As a member of the Indian Committee I voted for increased appropriations to enable the Indian Service to assist in the enforcement of this law. When the question of admitting Oklahoma to statehood was up before the House committee for consideration, I appeared before the committee and advocated the insertion of a provision in the enabling act which would require prohibition in that part of Oklahoma which was formerly occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes for a period of 21 years.

I voted for state-wide prohibition and I voted for the adoption of the State constitution prior to the admission of Oklahoma to statehood on November 16, 1907.

As a Member of Congress I voted for the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquor and gave Congress power to enforce the same by appropriate legislation. I voted for all appropriations recommended as necessary for the enforcement of the Volstead Act.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the recent decision of Kennedy v. the United States appealed from Osage County, Okla., sustained an amendment which I caused to be added to the Indian appropriation bill approved May 25, 1918, providing that the "possession by a person of intoxicating liquors in the Indian country where the introduction is or was prohibited by treaty or Federal statute shall be an offense and punished in accordance with" said act. This amendment substituted the word "or" for "and." It put teeth into the law. It made the possession of intoxicating liquors in the Indian country a criminal offense. It made the law enforceable. Theretofore the proof must show that the person was in possession of intoxicating liquor upon a restricted Indian's allotment. This amendment did away with the necessity for that proof. The Supreme Court, in the Kennedy decision, sustains the above amendment and holds that it is yet in force and that it was not repealed by the Volstead Act.

During the years that I have been privileged to represent the second congressional district of Oklahoma in the House I have not only voted for the laws hereinabove referred to, but every vote of mine has been in favor of prohibition.

I believe that prohibition can be enforced in every county throughout the United States where honest, efficient officers are elected who are in sympathy with the law, and I have no patience with the argument that the law is unenforceable.

I favored the law because I believe that it is best for the individual himself to abstain from the use of alcoholic beverages, and in proportion as you make it more difficult to secure, the less amount, of course, will be consumed. Persons addicted to the use of alcoholic liquor, who drink occasionally, will at times, unfortunately, drink to excess, and this leads to a loss in efficiency and earning power of the individual. It is an economic waste.

I favor prohibition because I believe alcoholic liquor destroys, in a large measure, the happiness and contentment of the home; wages are spent upon drink which should be used to clothe, feed, educate, and otherwise maintain the family; and I think no one will gainsay that the excessive use of alcohol does not tend to destroy the happiness of the home.

I favor prohibition for the reason that, in my judgment, alcoholic liquor is directly or indirectly the cause of a very large percentage of the crimes committed and is responsible for the very great cost of our criminal courts. Most of the serious criminal cases in my district, involving assault with intent to kill, murder, or manslaughter, are directly traceable to the excessive use of intoxicating liquor. I am sure the same is true in a large measure in every section of the country. These trials are a very heavy burden upon the taxpayers of the country.

The Volstead law enacted to vitalize the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution should receive the support of every officer, municipal, county, State, and Federal, from coast to coast.

Alcohol tends to blunt the moral sensibilities, weakens the mental powers and lessens personal efficiency. I think no one can successfully controvert that statement. It does not bring sunshine and happiness to the home, but distress and misery. Its use leads to excessive indulgence, and this does not increase the attendance at Sunday schools or churches. The day of the corrupting influence of liquor and saloons has gone never to return. We must educate our children, not debase them. Let us give them the advantage of our full earning power instead of dissipating our earnings in the purchase of alcohol and passing our time in idleness.

I have never heard or read a satisfactory defense of the use of liquor. The following are usually urged:

The first defense is that it interferes with our personal liberty, which of course is unsound if not for our best interest, and no one contends that the use of liquor is; and second, that it can not be enforced, and this, I repeat by way of emphasis, I emphatically deny; and third, the question of the expense in the enforcement of prohibition is urged, which of course is nothing as compared with the expense of our criminal courts added to the economic waste due to loss of efficiency and earning power of the individual; and fourth, the loss of revenue to the Government, and if we are correct in our belief that alcohol tends to debase instead of uplift the individual, the Government should not be maintained through revenue derived from this source.

It is being advertised in speeches made on the floor of the House that there is much sentiment among the Members of Congress for the modification or repeal of the Volstead Act, and some 60 bills have been introduced by Members of Congress and are pending before the Committee on the Judiciary. In my judgment, this represents practically all of the sentiment in the House of Representatives out of the 435 Members favoring a repeal or modification of the Volstead Act. I think that the Committee on the Judiciary should make a report, either adverse or favorable, on these bills during the present session of Congress, so that the sentiment of the House of Representatives may be tested out by a record vote upon this important question at an early date. Unless this is done the sentiment of the Members of the House will continue to be misrepresented on the floor of the House, through the public press, by letters, and by individual conversations. In my judgment, there would be an end to the efforts for the repeal or modification of this law if a report were made by the Judiciary Committee and a record vote had in the House before adjournment.

SALARIES OF TEACHERS

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, two matters of paramount importance have been brought to my attention. They may be considered matters of legislation affecting the essential welfare of practically every home in the District, which is the Nation's Capital. They are the bills providing for a graduated scale of increased salaries for school-teachers and compensation for the workmen of the District injured in the course of industrial occupations.

The eyes of the Nation turn toward the District of Columbia, and the popular impression has gone out that from the standpoint of cleanliness, health, education, and enlightenment this is the model city of the world. Yet it is not generally known that salaries for school-teachers in this District are inadequate, and that, aside from an enactment of Congress protecting governmental employees in their occupations, there is no workmen's compensation law here protecting workmen in the prosecution of the industries and business of the District other than governmental business.

What a terrible indictment this constitutes, not against our form of government or our Government but against the laxity of this administration along modern and humanitarian lines.

I shall discuss to-day the question of salaries for school-teachers in this District and shall ask your indulgence at a later date to discuss workmen's compensation here.

In fixing salaries for a public official, or quasi public official, in which latter class school-teachers may properly be placed, we are rapidly approaching the time these salaries must be fixed and governed according to the rules which govern salaries in industrial life. If we fail to adopt this course, practically the very best talent in the country which should find its way into the schoolroom will unquestionably pass to other lines of activity.

We regard it as important for one intellectual and administrative giant to preside over the destiny of one of our largest industries and receive a million dollars a year as his salary. We know that it is highly important to pay a reasonable wage to the railroad engineer who conducts the giant locomotive over our hills and valleys with the fate of human lives in his hands. It is important to pay good salaries to those who are engaged in the railroad, automobile, and banking industries, because those industries are important as a fundamental part of our national economic structure. But there is nothing more important than the training of the human mind, and particularly the youthful mind. The boys and girls of to-day are the future Americans of to-morrow.

Shall we become an intellectual nation? If so, the next generation must be intellectual. Is it not true that every means of national defense and possible war-time aggression in the future will have as their chief weapons devices conceived by the human mind and the intelligence of this and the following generations? If so, it becomes necessary that we raise the next generation as a scientifically intellectual generation, capable of commandeering the very elements themselves. The final test of every civilization comes when it asserts its right to existence when in conflict with the forces which seek to deter and destroy civilization by war. And yet, the wars in the future for the defense of civilization will have as their chief characteristics struggles in the air, beneath the sea, with all the consequent death-dealing devices composed of gases and electric currents, the latter conducted through the air, through the seven seas, and through portions of the earth itself. When such a test comes in the future—and come it probably will before many generations have passed into history—we must meet it with an intellectual and scientifically trained citizenship. Clubs wielded by brute force were once considered magnificent implements of warfare, shouts in the air were considered effective means of communication in times of war. To-day we have the poison gas, the submarine, the airplane, the seaplane, the Zeppelin, the mighty guns which throw implements of destruction miles from their bases, and many other death-dealing devices. The mastery of the air, of the sea, and of electric currents unquestionably will control the progress of civilization when civilization is again outlawed by the forces of might. Communication through the air, through the earth, and through the water, in control of the waves and impressions of sound, are now considered to be ordinary incidents by the men, women, and even the children of the country. Truly, our present-day civilization rests in our ability to progress along intellectual lines.

No work is more important than the molding of the human intellect by the teacher in the schoolroom, and yet, here in the Nation's Capital, with inflated prices following the greatest war in history, we pay some teachers as small an amount as $1,200 per year. We quibble about paying from $8,000 to $10,000 a year to the superintendent of schools in the city of Washington with its population of approximately 500,000 souls. An enterprise similar to the public-school system of this city, if conducted as a private enterprise would be manned by a manager receiving at least $100,000 a year. Every subordinate official having work to do in this private enterprise, as important as the work of any school-teacher in this city would receive at least $2,400 per year. We believe that this city should have the model school system of the world, and yet we spend hours of debate quibbling about a few dollars to be paid to a teacher doing the most important work in our national life to-day. I am reminded of a discussion I once heard in a meeting of a certain board of school directors in which certain prospective teachers participated. The question before the house was whether the board should pay a certain teacher $40 or $42 per month for a school term of seven months. One gentleman, who had argued strenuously for an hour that the teacher be paid $40 a month, finally agreed upon $42 upon condition that the teacher should "find" the coal to be burned in the large circular stove in the middle of the schoolroom. We expect our school-teachers to dress neatly and well, so that they may present a dignified appearance in the schoolroom and upon our highways. We expect them to live in the best part of our towns and cities. We impose upon them the obligation of appearing at all official, religious, and educational functions. We expect them to be leaders of thought in the community. We impose upon them all the penalties of leadership, and when they do not meet our standards of leadership, we are unsparing in criticizing them.

I recall with pleasure the two terms I spent as a teacher in the schoolroom—one term at $36 per month, and the other at $45 per month. I would not trade that experience for any other two years of my life, because I learned then something about the working of the human mind, the method of leading minds along the same line of thought as my own, and I acquired some ability in handling pupils and some of their troublesome parents, who conceived ideas that they could manage my school a little better than I did. But the school-teaching profession in those days, as now, did not hold out for me any hope for future advancement such as I entertained. The teaching profession being the most important in our national life, must be so compensated and must find such a place in our national economic establishment. Every school-teacher must be paid a salary which will enable all teachers to live reasonably well, to carry themselves in a dignified manner in our most intellectual society, to maintain an educational and social standing in the community, to keep up religious and fraternal affiliations, to educate their own children, and to conserve a reasonable amount of resources against old age. Until we pay salaries to bring that condition to pass, we have not done our duty in this generation.

I regret that the salaries provided for in this bill are not better. I would like to add a certain amount to each item in the scale provided for in this bill for every teacher to take some kind of an educational course during every school vacation to keep up with modern methods of advanced teaching and education, but we can hardly expect any teacher to spend any substantial amount of money upon self-improvement during vacation time, even along the salaries provided for in this bill.

I shall support the bill because it provides for an increase. As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia I shall be pleased to lend my efforts further along the lines upon which I have just addressed you.

SENATE

SUNDAY, May 25, 1924

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we recognize Thy hand in all the blessings of life. We recognize the same hand when sorrow gathers and our hearts are bleeding because of the loneliness experienced. We pray Thee that at this time, when words of testimony are uttered and we speak of those who have passed on, we may realize always that while there may be the cry for the touch of the vanished hand and the sound of the voice that is still there is infinite comfort in Thyself, sweetly consoling the sorrowing and helping us the better to understand the duties and the responsibilities of life. We ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I submit the following resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROUSSARD in the chair). The resolutions will be read.

The principal clerk read the resolutions (S. Res. 236), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sorrow of the death of Hon. H. GARLAND DUPRÉ, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, we have assembled to-day to pay tribute to the memory of HENRY GARLAND DUPRÉ, who for the past 14 years brilliantly represented the State of Louisiana and faithfully served the people of its second congressional district in the House of Representatives.

GARLAND DUPRÉ was born in Opelousas, La., July 28, 1873. His family had been prominent for generations. On the paternal side his grandfather was Judge Lucius L. Dupré, and his mother was the daughter of that "grand old man" of St. Landry Parish, Henry L. Garland, for whom he was named.

He received his early education in the public schools of his native city, and in later years enrolled as a student of Tulane University at New Orleans. In 1892 he graduated from that university and received the degree of A. B. Two years later, in 1894, he was awarded his legal degree of LL. B. From 1895 to 1910 he practiced law in the city of New Orleans and was active in Louisiana politics. He was elected to the Sixty-first Congress on November 8, 1910, to fill the unexpired term occasioned by the death of Hon. Samuel L. Gilmore, and at the same election was elected to the Sixty-second Congress. He represented the second congressional district from then to his death, February 21, 1924.

Gilmore came to Congress in March, 1909, resigning his office of city attorney of New Orleans, to which he had been elected for the fourth consecutive term in 1908. He served but a short time, however, and death came to him on July 18, 1910. It was a remarkable coincidence that GARLAND DUPRÉ, more than nine years assistant city attorney, was selected by the people of the second district to take the place in the House made vacant by the death of his friend and former associate.

POLITICAL CAREER

GARLAND DUPRÉ really won his spurs in the Louisiana Legislature. As a member of its house of representatives and its speaker for several years, he gained the experience which later served him so well and made him such a valuable member of the Louisiana delegation in Congress.

Mr. DUPRÉ was a young lawyer, just getting into practice, in 1903–4, when the first Democratic primary campaign in Louisiana was held. Justice Blanchard and Gen. Leon Jastremski, of Baton Rouge, ran for governor. The primary for the nomination of all State offices, breaking away from the old convention system, had the effect of inspiring many young men of brains and talent to launch their fortunes in the political arena. He was one of them. He became a candidate for the State legislature from the fourteenth ward. He was nominated and elected. He served four years with ability and distinction in Baton Rouge.

GARLAND DUPRÉ and James C. Henriques, member from the thirteenth ward, formed a close attachment, which was evidenced four years later when J. Y. Sanders was elected governor. Mr. DUPRÉ was returned to the house, and he had the ambition to be speaker. He entered the race despite the fact that politicians understood that Governor Sanders had indorsed Lee E. Thomas, of Shreveport, a man of great ability. Mr. Thomas had the backing of the old Sanders guard behind him.

It proved one of the most memorable battles over the speakership ever fought out at Baton Rouge. Mr. DUPRÉ, with his colleague, Mr. Henriques, and a group of young, active, aggressive friends went to Baton Rouge on the Saturday prior to the opening on Monday. They opened headquarters at the Istrouma Hotel. They met every train. Every new member was canvassed. They rounded up the country districts. The New Orleans regulars were in a quandary. They had to serve the incoming governor if patronage was expected. But they were unable to keep their forces from supporting DUPRÉ for speaker, if they ever tried. How much effort was made to draw the lines no one ever knew. There were breaks right and left, and Orleanians went to DUPRÉ despite pressure.

When the house was convened DUPRÉ won a brilliant and spectacular victory. He governed the house with exceptional ability. His committee selections were often referred to in the future.

Four years later he was talked of for governor. At one time there was a "GARLAND DUPRÉ boom" for governor, but just then came a turn of affairs which decided his fortunes lay along legislative lines. Samuel L. Gilmore, the former brilliant city attorney, and then Congressman, died. The district elected DUPRÉ and he went to Washington, surrendering whatever ambition he may have had to be governor.

SERVICE IN CONGRESS

GARLAND DUPRÉ'S service in the House of Representatives was marked by extreme loyalty to his State and district. In my long experience of 25 years in House and Senate I have never known a Member of either body who followed up more persistently than GARLAND DUPRÉ the measures of interest to his constituents.

The most striking instance of this devotion was manifested in the following incident which took place some time after he had taken his seat. He had been assigned to the Judiciary Committee in fulfillment of his ambition to serve on that committee, which was very congenial to him as a lawyer. By the rule of seniority he had risen until very near the top of this committee, and it was only a matter of time when he would become its chairman. A situation arose in Louisiana, however, in which he felt he could be of more service by becoming a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. For this purpose he sacrificed his high place on the Judiciary to accept the last place on Rivers and Harbors.

DUPRÉ was one of the most intellectual and best educated men in the House of Representatives. He was a close student of public questions and grasped quickly their meaning. It is related by a Member of the House that he could not recall having ever heard DUPRÉ inquire, "How shall I vote?" His inquiry would be, "What is the question before us?" and knowing that, he knew exactly what he wished to do and voted as his judgment dictated.

He possessed a thorough knowledge of parliamentary law. His strenuous experience as speaker of the house in the Louisiana Legislature served him in good stead while a Member of Congress. He followed closely parliamentary tangles on the floor of the House and often engaged in them when he had no direct interest in the outcome of the controversy. In testimony of his ability in this respect, let me quote from an editorial in the New Orleans States of February 22, 1924:

> It has been said that former Speaker Cannon, Republican, voluntarily in retirement, expressed the opinion that GARLAND DUPRÉ had the brightest mind of any man who had reached the lower House of Congress from Louisiana in many years.
> That may or may not be true. But no one will deny the keen intellect of the late Representative from the second district whose engaging personality along with his outstanding ability and experience had carried him to prominence both on the floor and in the committee.

I was personally very fond of GARLAND DUPRÉ and regarded him as one of my closest friends. We became acquainted when he entered Congress in 1910 and soon formed an intimacy which grew with years and had become very strong when GARLAND was called to his eternal home. It is said that "Love begets love," and I believe it. GARLAND and I were devoted to each other, and there was never the slightest rift between us.

The most beautiful trait of GARLAND'S character was his chivalric devotion to his mother and sisters. I have never seen a more marked instance of this than he constantly displayed, and his family seemed to idolize him. No son could have loved and honored a good mother better than GARLAND, and to his sisters, especially Miss Belle, he was always a kind, sweet brother.

It seemed too sad that a man of such fine parts, capable of doing so much for State and country, should be summoned while barely in the zenith of his powers; but God knoweth best; His holy will be done!

Mr. FESS. Mr. President and Members of the Senate, my acquaintanceship with Mr. DUPRÉ began when I entered the House of Representatives one year after he had become a Member of that body. Coming to the House of Representatives, as a student of its procedure quite naturally its personnel was of interest to me; and among the great number of men on both sides of the aisle who impressed me was GARLAND DUPRÉ. After learning of his early training I could easily understand why he so impressed the new Members. To a native ability that was somewhat rare, due to a fine ancestry, he had the acquired ability obtained from a course of training in a great university; and having served in the State legislature he came to the House of Representatives already a well-trained man.

I note that he was first assigned to the Committee on the District of Columbia. There is where he got his fine comprehension of what the Capital of the great Nation should be, and I have never known during his entire career a time when he had lost interest in the city beautiful and the Capital distinguished. He seemed to be one of the strong men in the other House who always stood for those measures designed to enhance the beauty of the Capital and its advancement, not so much as a place of residence but rather as the seat of power of the entire Nation. GARLAND DUPRÉ was one of the Members who gave expression to the thought that the Capital should be a place of beauty for all the people rather than merely for those who happened to be residents of the city.

I note that after a short service there he was assigned to the Committee on the Judiciary. That will explain the advanced position he took upon all legislation affecting legal procedure. Mr. DUPRÉ impressed himself on the Members of the House as a man who had a keen comprehension of the law, and I am sure that much of the legislation that has come from that committee during the last dozen years has the impress of this distinguished citizen.

As I recall my relationship with him, my mind reverts especially to his ardent support of every measure having for its object the improvement of waterways and harbors. Coming myself from Ohio, an inland State, bordering, however, a great water route, I was quite naturally interested in that particular problem, and having myself been a teacher of the history of our common country my attention naturally would be attracted to men like Henry Clay and other great advocates of the improvement of the waterways of the country. Consequently, when I became a Member of Congress it was with a predisposition in favor of that character of legislation. GARLAND DUPRÉ was one of the men in the House of Representatives, as the distinguished Senator now presiding [Mr. RANSDELL in the chair] is one of the men in the Senate, who impressed me with the possibilities of this newer field of transportation. While sometimes some of us may think that the agitation for the improvement of waterways has gone beyond bounds, yet the activities of Mr. DUPRÉ showed the intense devotion of a leading statesman in the development of what must yet come to be a very important agency in our business life, if not in our civilization.

I was always impressed also with this man's general ability. He had the comprehensive vision of the statesman who does not confine his interests to any particular locality. While he was greatly devoted to those things which were of peculiar interest to his own locality and was a fine representative of that type, yet he was always, as it appeared to me, quite independent. He never seemed to take any dictation; he did his own thinking, and always gave a reason for his position on legislation. In other words, he could not be classed as one of those who merely follow along, but he impressed me as a man who did what he thought was right, although it might at times require him to vote against what would appear to be the popular thing to do; and, if I may be permitted the remark, I will say that I believe that is the type of statesman that ultimately will give the greatest and best results to the country.

Mr. DUPRÉ and I had the privilege to serve through probably the greatest period or the greatest decade in the life of our Nation. We served previous to and during the World War; we voted together on the resolution declaring war; we participated in all the legislation made necessary by the trying circumstances of that tremendous convulsion that so shook the world, and as I look back over his activities I regard him as one of the staunch supporters of the honor of this Nation in that hour of stress and peril. I believe that those of us who were privileged to sit in the Halls of Congress during the period preceding and immediately following the war will in the future be regarded as having served the Nation in one of the greatest periods in the history of the world. Mr. DUPRÉ was a Member of Congress when some of the most outstanding pieces of legislation that have ever been enacted in the history of any country were placed upon the statute books. The opportunity thus afforded he embraced with the ardor of a patriot; he served well his day; and I think that his career, when measured by its value in history, will be regarded as that of an outstanding public servant.

Mr. President, I join the colleagues and friends of Mr. DUPRÉ, in his State and elsewhere, in mourning his loss, but bow, as we all must do, to the will of Him who has the lives of men and their destinies in His hands.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President and Senators, with others who were colleagues of the late GARLAND DUPRÉ, I offer the tribute which my recollection suggests.

One of the interesting features of the American Congress is the diversity in character of its Members. Then it is observed how naturally something of a kindred nature draws individuals into a group of friendly relationship independent of party lines and the interests of places separated by long distance. This often most peculiar something which draws men into closer social relations than general association is one of the gentler and most pleasing strains in the composition of our congressional existence.

The reasons for a lively common interest between GARLAND DUPRÉ and myself were sufficient to create it between a southern Democrat and a northern Republican, whose widely separated local influences came from the Gulf of Mexico and the Canadian border. But there is a peculiar relationship between that far South and that far North. In fact, there is an existent similarity which, running away back through the years, finds the same source in personality and nativity and religion.

GARLAND DUPRÉ was of French ancestry, of the same native stock as the discoverers and explorers who sailed up the St. Lawrence and later went down the Ohio and the Mississippi to the Gulf. Three centuries ago the explorers who christened my State Vermont, and who called the Gulf region Louisiana, were subjects of the Bourbon kings of France. The old trails that the explorer and the missionary blazed just north of my home lead from Quebec to New Orleans. I met men in the Dominion Parliament at Ottawa who, because of these facts, were like in character and ancestry to GARLAND DUPRÉ long before I knew him here in the American Congress. While I can understand how he could be in traits of character one of an unknown group to some, he was to me the representative of an intellectual, emotional, vivacious type, familiar and attractive, especially in the days of the brilliant Laurier.

GARLAND DUPRÉ was a native of Opelousas, St. Landry Parish, La. Long ago, before this American Republic had its creation, that land of scenic beauty became somewhat of a little empire. Just when and how this came about we do not know. That the transformation was fraught with many perils and much sacrifice, there is no doubt. Sometime back in the misty past all this was done by brave men and women who left their homes in sunny France, and, following pious fathers bearing aloft the cross, they established the community and the Christian religion where now is the parish of St. Landry, the pioneer settlement in all that southern region of present-day industry. It is a marvelous history, filled with adventure, hardships, tragedies, and achievements. But this is the remarkable fact which attracts our attention as we assemble today. Through all this drama of human existence, going back a century and a half or more, until there are no records, the Dupré family have played important parts, as have, through much of it, the Garland family.

It is a hundred and twelve years since Louisiana was admitted to the Union of States; but before that time Jacques Dupré, born on his father's plantation in St. Landry Parish, had grown to maturity. He was one of the early governors of the State about 100 years ago. GARLAND DUPRÉ was of the fourth generation in direct line of distinguished lawyers, whose ancestor was Gov. Jacques Dupré.

The mother of GARLAND DUPRÉ, Marie Celeste, a most attractive little woman, is still living, and is a direct descendant in the Garland family of honored lawyers, who for more than a century have been residents of the same homestead in St. Landry Parish.

These remarkable facts are fascinating, especially when one thinks how uncommon they are in this country. The separation of families from generation to generation is all too common with our people. Not only does the going of our children to distant places bring immediate grief, but long periods of separation from each other inevitably lessens the gentler emotions of family solicitude. I do not wonder that devotion to his mother and his sisters was so marked a quality in the nature of GARLAND DUPRÉ, and that he possessed a proud and reverent respect for his family and his home community is in no sense surprising. That quality in him was an inheritance from the centuries, grown rare and beautiful as the color of ancient abbeys about which successive generations dwell in the old France of his race, and which went on unchanged in the new France, to which it was transferred and where the customs and the sensibilities and the habitations of the family are still revered.

GARLAND DUPRÉ was an uncommon man. I have heard it said that he was peculiar and not easily understood on brief acquaintance. It is natural that some should take such impressions from him. His character was not made up of a multitude of attributes quickly adaptable to many different individuals and transient conditions. His character was a type. In a multitude he was as one in whom old emotions and influences survived to a greater degree than is common. His were the incentives and passions and convictions which centuries have neither exhausted nor explained, and which still continue in strength and beauty because they can never be understood. They were transmitted from an old land and came down unchecked through many generations and were highly developed in him. They all centered at last in his religion, which he held supreme. They were of the immortal soul of the man, which we commit to his Creator through the faith which passeth understanding and which he kept to the end.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, Louisiana and Mississippi are sisters. They are bound together by every tie that makes for the progress of each. Both hold dear to the same sentiments and prize highly the same traditions. Their sons fought side by side on the battle fields of Chalmette, at Monterey, and in the fierce struggles of every succeeding war.

I attended school as a young man at the State university in Louisiana. I learned to love her people more devotedly and to revere her traditions more highly. They are a big hearted, sentimental, historic, generous, hospitable people; they hate hypocrisy and shun sham; they think straight and fight bravely.

GARLAND DUPRÉ personified the highest qualities of Louisiana citizenship. True to the interests of his district and people, zealous of their rights, proud of their history, he was ever ready to champion their cause or to promote their progress. Few men possessed a keener intellect and a richer store of information than he. He was a gentleman in every sense of the word, and reverenced the superb qualities of woman.

If he were loyal to his friends, and he was; if he were faithful to his constituents, and he was; if he measured up full stature as a worthy representative of a great State, and he did; it was the constant attention and undivided devotion that he manifested toward his dear mother and beloved sisters that exhibited his finest qualities and won for him the highest praise. No trait is a finer and surer index into the true character of a man than his devotion and interest and care for his mother. No problem was too important, no question too urgent, to divert him from his ministration toward his mother when needed. And he was the apple of her eye—her only son, the one in whom she had visualized the future. She had seen him grow from success to success until he had impressed the Nation's history with his high character and exceptional ability.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, we are called in open session to commemorate the memory of one of our colleagues of the other branch of Congress.

It is a beautiful custom, that of holding memorial exercises for our dead, for, as we believe in a hereafter, our dead should be remembered and the memory of their good deeds kept fresh and green.

Only two weeks ago similar exercises were held at the other end of the Capitol, in the Chamber in which he rendered such signal service to his Nation, State, and constituency. I attended those services, and was deeply touched by the many kindly expressions by Members from various sections of this great country of the many really great qualities of heart and mind of our dearly beloved GARLAND DUPRÉ.

Others who have preceded me have dwelt upon his career from the time he was a barefooted boy in the old town of Opelousas, touching his school life, his early achievements as a young lawyer, and his elevation to the high office of, and of his services as, speaker of the Louisiana Legislature before his election to the Congress of the United States. I shall, therefore, make no further reference to those important events and incidents in GARLAND DUPRÉ's life, which presents a series of victories and accomplishments worthy of our praise and commendation.

These deserved successes should be ample proof to those who knew him not intimately that he was a strong and capable man. But to those of us who knew and were close to him, that record was the inevitable result of the natural and cultivated sterling qualities which he possessed. GARLAND had an incisive mind. His grasp of complicated and intricate situations was marvelous. If one stated to him any proposition, no matter how interwoven the facts, GARLAND needed no repetition to seize, instantly separate the relevant from the irrelevant, and that minute draw a correct conclusion as to what should be done.

In deciding what was best for his country, State, and constituency, GARLAND had no thought of self, and having arrived at a conclusion his personal sacrifice could never be so great as to induce him to alter his course. In other words, he was a well-balanced, forceful, intelligent, capable man, using the powers which God had so liberally bestowed upon him, not for his own good or advancement but, as God intended, for the good of humanity.

All who knew him well know that he had the courage to stand by and defend his convictions. In other words, he was morally strong and honest. But he was, be it said to his great credit, intellectually honest. If he disagreed with anyone, he so stated then and there. To him it was intellectual dishonesty to fail to express any view but one his good judgment prompted. Mr. President, frequently men of that temperament offend until one learns to know their true character and honest motive; then one admires them.

One of the qualities which helped GARLAND in life was his promptness in meeting his appointments. On every occasion of which I have knowledge when he had engagements on official business GARLAND was always on time. I never knew him to be late or to fail to be present when he had made an engagement. When he had official matters to present to an official of the Government GARLAND always knew all about his case, and no one could present that case more forcibly than could he.

Mr. President, I could speak for many hours about GARLAND. He was a good, loyal friend of mine, and it was always a pleasure for me to meet him. I recall how almost daily he visited this Chamber, always having some witty, smart thing to say. He had plenty of humor, and enjoyed the exchange of pleasantries as much as any man. He was a real human being. I have missed him.

We all are familiar with the great love he had for his good mother and his sisters. But, Mr. President, GARLAND also loved his friends and his people.

GARLAND was the descendant of two of the greatest families of Louisiana. They before him had won high place in the history of Louisiana. For generations their services have been gratefully recognized by our people. GARLAND lived true to the traditions of those illustrious families—the Garland and the Dupré families. They are, and should be, proud of him, because we who were merely friends are proud of his wonderful career. We understand not the plan of the Father at all. We have been taught that all happens for the best; but we may here, with due deference to God's plans, express regret that our dear friend GARLAND should not have been spared for longer service to Nation, State, and constituents.

Mr. President, the Louisiana delegation will miss his genial disposition and his wise counsel and advice; for his wide experience in legislative procedure and his thorough understanding of our problems always furnished good and sound advice. Whenever our delegation meets hereafter we shall miss and think of him.

May his soul rest in peace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolutions are unanimously agreed to.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HUMPHREYS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANSDELL in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The principal clerk read the resolutions (H. Res. 248), as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 16, 1924.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. BENJAMIN GRUBB HUMPHREYS, late a Member of this House from the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions, and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be read.

The principal clerk read the resolutions (S. Res. 237), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sorrow of the death of Hon. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS, late a Representative from the State of Mississippi.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, Mississippi has furnished her full quota of distinguished statesmen. In the House and in the Senate she has measured up with the great men of other States. I would not pluck a single jewel from the records of the many distinguished statesmen who have represented Mississippi in the House of Representatives, but when the long history is told none will have surpassed the record of Hon. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS.

An indefatigable worker, with a keen sense of humor, a high educational training, a personality that was as attractive as it was charming, and an unexcelled natural ability, it was destined the he should forge to the front among the really great statesmen of the day. While I shall always remember him for his lovable human traits and his unswerving loyalty, history will know him for his tireless persistence and unyielding devotion to river and harbor improvements. Without minimizing the splendid services of those who helped to mold and crystallize public opinion for flood protection, it was due more to his remarkable genius than any other person. It was his big brain that conceived and his unerring finger that pointed the way, and an incomparable popularity that carried through successfully the organization of the Flood Control Committee in the House. Surrendering his ranking, commanding position on the Rivers and Harbors Committee, he accepted the chairmanship of the Flood Control Committee and carved from its considerations the present flood control law. The people of the Mississippi Valley owe to his memory a debt of gratitude that time can not repay. There is not a community in the whole country interested in river and harbor improvements that has not received benefits from his wise counsel and exceptional efforts.

He possessed more sentiment and the most unselfish heart of any person with whom I have come in contact. For a friend, no request went unanswered, no demand unheeded.

How often, Mr. President, have I basked in the sunshine of his genial company and listened for hours to his quaint and witty expressions, his stirring stories, his old-fashioned negro dialect. His imagery was never quite so captivating as when he recalled the old days of steamboating on the Mississippi and the race between the Natchez and the Robert E. Lee. He reflected the history, the legends, the poetry, and the aspirations of the people of the Mississippi Delta.

He never failed to get what he wanted. There was no let-up in the thing he set out to do. Some years ago he came to me and requested that I accompany him to see the Secretary of War. I accepted his requests always as commands. We went. The War Department was about to complete some service boat to be placed on the Mississippi River at or near Greenville. He suggested to the Secretary that the boat be christened and named the Ben Humphreys. In explanation of his desire, in the most eloquent and striking expressions, he drew a word picture of the plantation life in the Delta of the Mississippi. He spoke of its traditions and its sentiments; he pictured this river boat slowly moving downstream upon the bosom of the mighty Mississippi, and how, as it would pass along plantation after plantation, and its sharp whistle would announce its approach, the negroes even would say, "There comes the Ben Humphreys."

The Secretary was moved by his simple suggestion, but expressed regrets that because of a statute no Government boat could be named after a living man. Quicker than a flash the wit of our departed friend exerted itself and replied, "Then I want you to name it after my departed father, who was a general in the Confederate Army and at one time Governor of Mississippi."

The Secretary of War said, "I will be glad to do so. What was his name?"

The reply was, "Benjamin G. Humphreys."

As a statesman he possessed that remarkable quality now so often lacking in the present-day American politician. He formed his own conclusions, and no popular gust could move him. He took his congressional duties seriously, and always voted from the highest sense of conscientious convictions. Great as he was as a statesman, devoted as a friend, popular as a citizen, witty and humorous and eloquent as an orator, quick and ever ready as a debater, the most outstanding quality of his being was his devotion to his family. He loved them with a devotion that bordered upon idolatry. His place in his city, his State, and his Nation can not be filled; his services are now a memory, but will ever be an inspiration to the youth of the land.

I saw our departed friend just two weeks before his death at the home of a mutual friend. It was at Winona, Miss., and the occasion was the burial of our former colleague, Thomas U. Sisson. I was to meet him the day following his death, and we were to journey through his district to mingle and meet friends together. His death to me, his death to all, was so sudden and such a shock. My heart is heavy, Mr. President, for in the death of BEN HUMPHREYS I lost my dearest friend, my most trusted adviser, my wisest counselor.

They laid him to rest in the beautiful cemetery, beneath a bed of flowers, close by the waters he had done so much to harness. And just as his thousands of friends, with heavy hearts and bowed heads, were paying their last tribute, the heavens seemed to unfold and add their tears to the sorrowful occasion. Sleep on, good man; thy spirit will live forever.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the membership of Congress changes with amazing rapidity. There is but one Member in the House of Representatives now who entered it when I did 25 years ago who has served continuously since that time. There are but four in the House now who entered before I did, and only two of these have continued in service since. There are but two in the Senate who were here when I entered the House. Death has had no small part in these changes. I have had no time to look into the matter, but my impression is that the mortality in Congress is as great proportionately as in our armies during war. Of course, the average age of the membership is greater, but the intensity of the work and its confining character are in no small degree responsible for this great mortality. There may be a popular notion that Members of Congress have a life of ease and idleness, but the fact is that, take them as a whole, they work longer hours and more intensely than any other class of men, and this has much to do with the great mortality.

I was greatly shocked when the news came to me that Congressman HUMPHREYS had passed away. The last time I had seen him he seemed to be strong and healthy and good for many years yet in the service of his country.

I first became acquainted with him in the Fifty-eighth Congress. Not long afterwards he became a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, of which I was a member, and I got to know him quite well. My respect and regard for him grew with the years, and it was a real grief to me to learn of his passing over the river we must all cross.

He and I were of a different political faith, but I could have respected him no more if he had belonged to my party. He was tenacious of his own beliefs and principles, but most tolerant of the views of others.

He was a gallant soldier in the war with Spain, and was first lieutenant of a company which he raised at the outbreak of the war. He offered his life to his country on the battle field, and I have no doubt that his intense and loyal service to his country in peace shortened his life many years.

He was a clean-speaking, clean-living man. He had a manner and way about him that drew one to him and made one look forward with pleasure to his companionship. I have no recollection of any unpleasant impression from any word or act of his. His was an influence that brought out the best in those with whom he came in contact. It was a good thing for any man to know "BEN" HUMPHREYS. One could not associate with him long without feeling better, living better, and having more confidence in the integrity and patriotism of our public servants. It is through lives like his that partisanship controls less and patriotism influences more the lives and acts of public men. Congressman BENJAMIN HUMPHREYS was a good man, a gallant soldier, a faithful representative of the people, and a proved patriot whose private and public life will inspire our young men to a better and loftier citizenship.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, in keeping with the custom, as old as life, we have met to-day to pay tribute to a departed friend. While each of us realizes that words, mere words, however feelingly spoken, can lend nothing to the character and achievements of those who have laid aside the burdens of living, yet, mayhap, our appraisement of their virtues may give heart to us who carry on when they have ceased from their toils.

With that purpose, and the further desire also to leave a record of the esteem in which this our departed friend and fellow worker was held by us who labored with him, to-day we are assembled to bear testimony to the character and worth of that noble Mississippian, the Hon. BEN HUMPHREYS.

Among the first to welcome me to the House of Representatives when I became a Member of that body was he, now dead, but then the embodiment of life, of laughter, and of hope.

In all the years of our association, and they were many and close, I never heard him give utterance to an unkind or an ungenerous expression, and better, far better than that, no one's cares and no one's sorrows were added to by word or act of his. No one's burdens were made heavier by either action or failure of action by him. On the contrary, he sought to be helpful wherever assistance could be rendered. He was sympathetic whenever sorrow came to others. In partial repayment for all these acts of kindness and thoughtfulness on his part we exclaim, as sang the poet:

> How many a poor one's blessings with him went > Underneath that low green tent
> Whose curtain never outward swings.

The recital of our friend's achievements, his hardships and triumphs, I shall leave to those of his own State who have preceded me to-day.

Born of a distinguished family, formerly wealthy but impoverished by the War between the States, he preserved and exemplified all of that family's fine traditions. He faced undaunted poverty and misfortune and wore the laurels of his successes with modesty.

BEN HUMPHREYS, living, worked hard, laughed merrily; he played when the day's tasks were accomplished with zest, with the same zest that he bestowed upon the duties which were his to perform.

This, our friend, was a many-sided man. Each phase of his character, as he unfolded them to view, brought both admiration and delight.

His heart was with his own people. Their needs were his constant care. The great river which through the ages had builded up the magnificent Delta in which was his home had turned to destroy that which it had created. To prevent this he labored both day and night. The curbing of that river's flood by a thousand miles of sinuous dikes is his monument. He needs no other. In fact, no other would be appropriate. Generations of children yet unborn will play and men that are to be will toil in safety from the river's ravage, and as they play or as they toil they will point to these long lines of heaped-up earth which protect them from the river's flood and say, "To these we owe our safety, and for these we are indebted to the man who to-day sleeps upon that river's brink," the man to whose memory these feeble words seek to pay tribute, the Hon. BEN HUMPHREYS! For truly he was the master builder. To rear the levees and bring safety to his people he strove with such unrelenting toil that death came earlier than otherwise it would. And to this task likewise he sacrificed his earthly ambition, which was to have been governor of his native State. His father, whom he loved and devoutly honored, had faithfully and well before him filled that exalted station, and he, that father's son, longed to follow in his footsteps. This honor was denied him. Denied him not by his people's unwillingness to bestow it but by the necessity to accomplish the task to the doing of which he had dedicated his every effort and in the achievement of which finally he laid down life itself. His success was worthy of a whole heart's giving, and he gave freely; he gave time, he gave strength, he gave ambition, he gave health, and he gave life! We who are the beneficiaries of his sacrifices seek to repay in the only coin which can reach him in that realm which lies beyond, in gratitude, in renewed respect, in a loftier ambition, and, we hope, in a better and purer living for the example which his unselfish life affords.

Mr. RANSDELL (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). Mr. President, it is said that a fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind in this world. BEN HUMPHREYS spent most of his life on the banks of the Mississippi River in the great overflow section of the lower Yazoo Delta in the city of Greenville. I have spent 40 years of my life in the little city of Lake Providence in the upper end, the fifth Louisiana levee district, in the extreme northeast portion of my State. My home is only a few miles below that of BEN HUMPHREYS, his being on the east bank of the great river, mine on the west bank. Our constituents and friends have identically the same interests. Our labors were the same.

We entered Congress at nearly the same time. We were members of the same committee—Rivers and Harbors—for a great many years. We devoted our lives to aiding in controlling the floods of that great river, the Mississippi. Senators, that problem has confronted the people of the valley for more than 200 years—ever since Bienville constructed the first levee in front of the city of New Orleans in 1718, when the great city of to-day was only a little hamlet.

From that time to this moment levees have been built, extended into new places, made stronger and better, until now more than 1,500 miles of great dikes bar out the waters of the river from the adjacent lands. And what are these lands that are protected? They constitute 28,000 square miles of the finest soil in America; 18,000,000 acres of as rich land as there is on this continent; an area sufficiently great to produce more than one-half of all the cotton grown in this country, if all of these lands were cleared, protected, and placed under cultivation, together with a very large percentage of the sugar needed for our people, of the corn needed, of the oats needed, of the rice needed, for all of those great crops are produced in abundance in the vast area of this mighty valley. It was to the task of protecting these very fertile lands that BEN HUMPHREYS devoted his life.

He was preceded in that task by a number of eminent men in both Houses of Congress. It would be invidious for me to give much praise to any of them unless I could mention all; yet, Senators, I do not believe anyone can complain if I refer to the honored names of Randall Lee Gibson and Newton C. Blanchard, of Louisiana; of James H. Berry, of Arkansas; and of Thomas C. Catchings, of Mississippi. Those four men surely earned especial praise from the people of the Mississippi Valley for the wonderful services rendered by them in extending levees and having laws passed to control the floods of the great river.

As far back as 1879 a statute was passed which created the Mississippi River Commission and charged it with the duty of guarding the lands adjacent to the river from flood and also with certain responsibilities in connection with navigation; but the principal task of that commission was to protect the valley lands from overflow. Marked progress has been made during the 45 years since the commission was created, and to no man is greater credit due for that progress, especially during recent years, than to BEN HUMPHREYS. Unfortunately the task is not as yet completed; many years of labor lie before us and many millions of dollars must be expended before the task shall be finished and the valley be entirely safe from occasional damage by flood waters. Relatively we are safe, and our people are prosperous and happy in most places, though in some localities great anxiety is still felt.

Again I trust that I may not be considered invidious when I say that RILEY J. WILSON, of Louisiana, and WILLIAM J. DRIVER, of Arkansas, are entitled to very great credit in the legislative work of flood control. They cooperated splendidly with Representative HUMPHREYS in his mighty task. And, oh, Senators, it is a mighty task, for when the accumulated waters of the Mississippi River, gathered from the rain that falls in 31 States of this imperial Nation, send down an angry flood to the Gulf a battle array is created which it is extremely difficult for the puny forces of man to combat, and when the efforts of man succeed in fighting those floods successfully there is much glory due to all who have any part in the battle. As Schley said to Sampson after the Battle of Santiago, "There is glory enough for all"; so it is a proud tribute to the memory of BEN HUMPHREYS that he was leader in the House of Representatives during the last 10 years in the effort to secure flood-control legislation. It is a great honor to the memory of BEN HUMPHREYS that his name is attached, and always will be attached, to the two great acts of flood-control legislation passed in 1917 and 1923.

I have never known a man, Mr. President and Senators, who more whole-heartedly devoted himself to one great cause, to the practical exclusion of everything else, than BEN HUMPHREYS devoted himself during his entire career to measures of flood relief on the Mississippi, and, withal, he was a man of brilliant intellect, of varied resources, extremely popular, and exceedingly magnetic in his personality. It is said of him that there was no more popular man in the House of Representatives than he; but all of his intellect, all of his popularity, all of the hard work of which he was capable were devoted to the one task of doing everything possible to protect his constituents of the Yazoo Delta of the Mississippi from overflow; and in doing that he also protected the people of Missouri, of Illinois, of Arkansas, and of Louisiana, because all of them had the same problem, all of them had the same hard struggle to make. It was a cooperative effort of many strong, true men, and because of that fine cooperation under able leaders there followed at least reasonable success, with ultimate victory in sight.

In the death of Mr. HUMPHREYS the people of the Mississippi Valley, not alone those of the State of Mississippi but of the entire overflow area, the entire 28,000 square miles, the entire 18,000,000 acres of that wonderful valley, have lost one of the best friends they ever had.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, some one has said that while a man is yet living his fellow men judge him by his worst deeds and when dead by his best. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS, judged by his worst deeds, would measure up to an exalted standard of citizenship and of private character. He was possessed of a striking and impressive personality. Looking back over a protracted period of service in the Congress one may recall Members of days long past whose appearance and personal characteristics have grown confused and indistinct in memory, but this is not true, it will never be true, of Mr. HUMPHREYS. His individuality will stand out, and the attributes of his character will remain distinct in the memories of all Representatives and Senators who were fortunate enough to be associated with him. Cordiality of manner, geniality of disposition, sympathy with the troubles of others, and good fellowship, added to other distinctive personal characteristics, made Mr. HUMPHREYS one of the most striking figures in the American Congress of his time.

His service demonstrated unusual ability as a legislator. He was familiar in its every detail with parliamentary law and with legislative procedure. He possessed a thorough comprehension of constitutional provisions and limitations.

Few men in either branch of Congress during the last 20 years have demonstrated more reliable information respecting the large issues before Congress than Mr. HUMPHREYS. He was in close touch with local problems. Others have referred to the great measure with which his name is inseparably associated. Some public men whom we have known are illustrative, their names are suggestive, of movements with which they have been connected, of measures which they have cooperated to enact. In the present Congress there are some whose services have marked them as prominently connected with important reforms.

The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has led the movement in behalf of waterway transportation, and particularly for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the Nation; and when his name is mentioned one thinks of that phase of his public service. The names of other Senators are suggestive of movements in which they have led, of measures which they have helped to formulate, of reforms which they have suggested; and this has been true in every period of our country's history. Moreover, some public men so embody the spirit of the section from which they come that to mention their names is to arouse appreciation for the characteristics of the people who dwell in those communities.

Fortunately for the Nation, there are some names glorified by services so important and so enduring that the mention of them is suggestive of the national spirit, of the large events and far-reaching movements which are a part of the heritage of all our people. One can not think of Washington, of Jefferson, of Lincoln, or of Wilson without being thrilled with a recollection of the patriotic principles and motives, the exalted purposes and resolute achievements, which make them representative of the whole Republic.

While Mr. HUMPHREYS was in no sense provincial in his views, or narrow in his sympathies, or prejudiced in his policies, he is, in a very important way, to all who knew him well, illustrative of that peculiar type of citizenship which predominates in influence in the Mississippi Delta. Courageous, aggressive, endowed with tenderness of feeling and refined sympathies, capable of many sacrifices and of useful services, it is not surprising that his name should be inseparably connected, as has been stated by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], with a measure which, while national in an important sense, is yet of peculiar importance to the Mississippi Delta and to the Mississippi Valley as a whole.

No one who has not lived in or visited and observed conditions in the Mississippi Valley can quickly have a full appreciation of the importance of the flood control measure from an economic standpoint. Gathering its volume in northern snows and glaciers, this mighty Father of Waters at periodical times in the past sent its yellow floods over vast areas of the richest lands on earth; and when these floods came they carried with them to destruction the results of the labors and efforts of thousands of citizens. They swept away the accumulations of years. They deprived the Nation of the products of fertile lands, of products essential to the happiness and comfort of the people as a whole. Mr. HUMPHREYS, combining his efforts with those of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and of others who had a somewhat local, and therefore intimate, interest in securing the legislation, cooperated in the preparation and the enactment of the flood control act, which may be regarded as one of the most important and effective measures enacted by the Congress during recent years.

While his labors and his thought were devoted for a long period to the passage of flood-control legislation, his attention and his efforts were by no means confined to that important measure. He demonstrated a knowledge of general legislation and a familiarity with legislative processes which made him one of the influential factors in the House of Representatives.

By sincerity of purpose, devotion to sound principles of government, prompt and efficient performance of duty, Mr. HUMPHREYS illustrated the best standards of official life. He exemplified the highest attributes of human character, strong friendships, sincere motives, charity toward the faults and frailties of others, helpfulness, and an abiding faith in the spirit of the social and political institutions of our country.

There is universal grief among the Members of Congress; there is widespread regret at the departure of this useful public servant.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, Mississippi has never been without great and good men. They have entered all the walks of life and have made names for themselves that reflected honor and glory on the State.

If we call the roll of lawyers, orators, and statesmen in the Nation, the names of Mississippians will be heard; and they will be found high on the list. The very reference to this fact causes the mind to be flooded with the names of great men and the records of their splendid achievements. Their lives and their greatness are a substantial part of the life and greatness of the State and Nation.

Many of these great Mississippians, each in his particular sphere, were the equal of any man the Nation has produced. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS, in whose memory these exercises are being held, possessed in a large measure every element that contributed to the greatness of these men, and at the same time he had some other characteristics of true greatness that all of them did not have.

A great character is often marred by some small vice, by egotism and vanity, by an unpleasing mannerism, by lack of cordiality, by selfishness. It was not so with him.

Whatever faults he may have had were small. His character, like a splendid diamond whose brilliance is increased by the number and shape of its facets, was the composite of so many various elements that he stood among us as one who was truly great, and any weakness that he may have had was unnoticed.

In the House of Representatives, where he served for more than 20 years, he was very popular. Perhaps no more popular man ever served in that body. Every one was his friend, and he was the friend of every one.

In talking with his former colleague I have been impressed by the fact that every mention of him was a eulogy. Tributes of praise, of respect, of admiration were paid by each one, and they came from the fullness of the hearts of friends.

Mr. President, I shall attempt, very briefly, to mention some of his most prominent characteristics—those outstanding qualities that attracted men to him and that endeared him to men.

His personality was pleasing. His was a happy disposition. He possessed the power to please and of being pleased. No one ever enjoyed the association of friends more than he.

In every crowd he added something to the pleasure of the occasion. His conviviality, always restrained within proper bounds, made him an attractive and congenial companion. His jests, his bright quips, his humorous raillery, his large fund of striking and entertaining anecdotes made him welcome in any assemblage where good fellowship had its sway.

Immortality implies than man will be identically the same through all eternity; that death does not rob him of any of those attributes which are necessary to that identity.

If that be true, it is very probable that he has often looked down on his friends of former days and has enjoyed their meeting together—that he has smiled at every jest and chuckled over every good story, just as we remember him doing when he was with us.

There was also a serious side to his nature. He was a thoughtful man, a student. He was familiar with good literature. History was a favorite study. He had a strong touch of the poetic in him, and he could speak the language of the great poets. His knowledge of the science of government and the underlying principles of our Republic was profound.

Thus he was able, both in his conversation and in his speeches, to attract attention, to entertain, and to instruct his hearers.

His devotion to the fundamental principles of the Government was unfaltering. He was always ready to do battle for them, fighting alone if necessary. The shiftings of public opinion that sometimes threaten the foundations upon which our Nation rests never caused him to waver. No man ever gave as little attention to the effect his vote might have on his own political fortunes. The only question with him was this, What is right?

Not only was he always ready to defend these principles but he was always able to make a good defense. He was a good debater, prompt in attack, ready in defense, full of resources gained by long experience and careful study of the subject. He had quickness and clearness of perception, the power of discrimination, the ability to detect sophistry, a love of fairness, rectitude, and truth, the power of sly sarcasm and stinging satire.

He was admired and respected because of his ability, but no more for that than for his courage. One of the needs of the hour is the courage of conviction. Popular clamor, often unreasoning, seems to be supreme.

The only safe leader is one whose judgment is inspired by convictions of principle and duty. Our friend had physical, intellectual, and moral courage. It was a part of his very nature, and it was developed by constant exercise. He had that courage that enabled him to stand alone without being wedged in a crowd.

> Courage—the highest gift, that scorns to bend
> To mean devices for a sordid end.
> Courage—an independent spark from heaven's bright throne,
> By which the soul stands raised, triumphant, high, alone.

Few men are heroes. For one soul who has this high courage there are scores who have a passion for self-interest that oftimes makes cowards of them. No man can become a leader of men and retain that leadership very long who does not possess that high courage that will cause him to do right without regard to his own selfish interest.

His courage did not lead to recklessness. He had a perpetual serenity and sunshine of spirit, though always firm and positive in his positions. Moderate and candid, he was always unyielding with regard to principle.

He was an effective champion of any cause that met his approval. Men listened to him not only because they recognized his ability but because they had confidence in him.

They knew that he had built ethics into his nature and that he was swift to obey the voice of conscience. When he spoke, his character testified for him. Integrity was as inseparable from his character as fragrance from the rose or music from running water. Men knew that he was free from artifice and disguise and sophistry, and they were willing to follow his leadership.

He had an unyielding spirit of honor and integrity and a moral purpose that never faltered. If it be true that "the man of absolute integrity and of supreme devotion to duty will not be denied a place among the great," he is entitled to high rank.

Mr. President, I shall not tell of his early life and history before he became a Member of Congress, except to say that he was the son of Gen. Benjamin G. Humphreys, a gallant Confederate soldier and Governor of Mississippi, and that when the Spanish-American War began, inspired by the martial spirit of his father as well as by patriotic impulses, he enlisted in that war.

Governor Humphreys was removed from office during the reconstruction period by Federal soldiers, and this act was witnessed by his son, and was perhaps one of his earliest recollections. It is probably true that one of his unfulfilled ambitions was to be governor of his State, and I may say that I earnestly urged him to run for that office, believing in his fitness and qualifications for it.

BEN HUMPHREYS has left us, but countless monuments remain erected to his memory in the hearts of those who knew him. But there is another monument that will last after these friends shall depart. In the laws of the Nation his impress has been fixed. In the great Delta, whose people he loved so much and whom he served so ably and faithfully, there will remain as long as time shall last a monument to him in the work that he did as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee and as chairman of the Committee on Flood Control.

May I say this: That it gives us, his old friends and colleagues here, great pleasure to see his son, Hon. W. Y. HUMPHREYS, occupying the position held so long by his father, and succeeding so splendidly in that work.

I shall not attempt to review the great work that Mr. HUMPHREYS did while a Member of the House. That has been done very fully and splendidly by other Senators. What they have said has my hearty indorsement.

Mr. HUMPHREYS was very devoted to his family. His wife, son, daughter, little grandchildren, were sources of pride and joy to him. He lavished his affection on them. Their sorrow, no doubt, was increased by the suddenness of his death.

But I believe that he died as he wished, without much warning. The last time that I saw him was at Winona, Miss., where we had gone to attend the funeral of Hon. Thomas Upton Sisson, a former colleague of ours and himself one of the State's greatest sons.

Mr. Sisson had died very suddenly. As we were going out to the cemetery, sitting in the same car, Mr. HUMPHREYS and I were discussing the unexpected death of our friend. In the course of our conversation he said:

I used to pray, "Deliver us from sudden death," but I have about decided that is the best way to die.

Nothing that can be said or done will entirely relieve their grief, but it is, I am sure, great comfort to them to recall his many evidences of love and affection, the splendid heritage that he left in the life that he had lived, his almost unexampled record that he made as a public official, and the high esteem in which he was held by all who knew him.

Of course, they need no assurance from me, but as an intimate friend and as one who had known, admired, and loved him for more than a quarter of a century, I want to say that he was a true and faithful man and friend; that he believed in those things that are good, pure, and holy; that he was always anxious to render service to those who needed assistance; that his heart was filled with sympathy for the poor, the wronged, the fetter-galled; and that he left a more lasting impression on human hearts and on the life of his State and Nation than can be accredited to but few men.

We say that BEN HUMPHREYS is dead. The Christian religion has taken away from the grave's brink the thorns and briars of despair and planted in their stead the beautiful flowers of hope and trust and love. It teaches that men live forever. Though dead in the flesh, they are alive in the spirit. They are ever present with us in the examples they have set, the truths they have uttered, and the lives they have lived.

If this be true, BEN HUMPHREYS, as a result of the labors that he wrought, of the example that he set, of the influences that he exerted, will live through the ages.

We shall miss him greatly, but we can only—

Wait the great teacher, death,
And God adore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANSDELL in the chair). Without objection, the resolutions will be unanimously agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representatives, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and the Senate (at 1 o'clock p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, May 26, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SUNDAY, May 25, 1924

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. ALMON, Speaker pro tempore.

The following prayer was offered by Rev. William James Seelye, of Washington, D. C.:

O Thou in whom we live and move and have our being, we recognize Thee as the giver of every good and perfect gift. One of Thy best gifts to us is this great and good land of ours. Help us to love her with all our hearts, with true patriotism, and as we plan our national and international program of policies grant that we may never forget that Thou art the source of all wisdom and power. Give us that constant view and realizing sense of the best spiritual traditions. Surround us with a realizing sense of a bright spiritual horizon and keep our eyes fixed steadily forward on those high spiritual ideals which make a country what it is, and as we celebrate now in this season of surrender and the sacrifice of thousands and tens of thousands of precious lives for the love of our country, help us to realize that unfading glory that attaches to the living for her. And all shall be to the praise of Thy glory and Thy grace. Amen.

By unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was omitted.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JOHN R. TYSON

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the special order for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. HILL of Alabama, by unanimous consent—

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 327

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That all Members be granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the life, character, and public service of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, as I came to the Capitol this morning, and beheld the beauty of the day, the warmth of the sunshine, the sweet fragrance of the flowers, and the soft green of the turf, all nature proclaiming that eternal verity, the doctrine of the resurrection, I could not but feel that God himself had joined with us in paying tribute to JOHN R. TYSON. On the 27th day of March of last year, far from home, far from the land of his birth, far from the people he loved and who loved him, in the distant city of Rochester, Minn., JOHN R. TYSON was touched by the death angel and carried home to his God. In the full strength of years, while yet in love with life and raptured with the world, the mighty tribune of the people, the valiant warrior, spent in the fight, passed out of the company of living men. Despite the warning of friends and physicians, he had labored on, and he fell beneath the weight of his burdens.

JOHN R. TYSON was of the heroic line; his was the arm for battle, his the soul to dare, his the will to the end. He knew no fear. He defied the storm. He asked no favors. He scorned to do wrong. He hated those who bent the knee in servile submission. He took his stand where his clear and comprehensive judgment directed him.

Having once taken his position he was as firm in the cause he advocated and espoused as the granite hills. When others winced, he cried "Forward"; when others hesitated, he marched on; when others retreated, he advanced; when others placed their trembling hands upon the altar of compromise, he stood defiant. His was the courage of Sir Andrew Barton—

"Fight on, my men," says Sir Andrew Barton,
"I am hurt, but I am not slaine;
I'll lie me down and bleed a-while,
And then I'll rise and fight againe."

The great and proud Commonwealth of Alabama has claimed many brilliant stars in the galaxy of her genius, but none more refulgent than JOHN R. TYSON.

Born on the 28th day of November, 1856, in Lowndes County, Ala., JOHN R. TYSON was ushered into a civilization of culture and of attainment. His father, John A. Tyson, belonged to the slave-holding class of the South, a class that dedicated its sons to intellectual and political life, a class that gave to the country so much of its brilliant statesmanship before the War between the States. Young JOHN R. TYSON early gave promise of the remarkable career which was to crown his life. He first went to Alabama College, now known as Howard College, where he increased his fund of knowledge and made friends among the people of the State which he was to serve so long and so well. After graduation at Howard College he took up the study of law and became proficient in his chosen profession at Washington and Lee University in Virginia, an institution still redolent of the memory of Robert E. Lee, who only a few years before had been its president.

In the days of his youth JOHN R. TYSON began the habits of industry and the training of that acute intellect which in later years were destined to achieve so much triumph. Power and conquest and leadership slumbered in his rugged arms and steadfast heart. He resolutely set his heart on success, and concentrated every faculty of his mind and body on the attainment of his darling point. He was ever relentless in his energy and enthusiasm to accomplish the things he set out to do. He brought to support his ambition courage, industry, and patience, and he trampled on genius. He rose above his fellows as steadily and as surely as the sun climbs above the mountains.

After his graduation in law he returned home to the people who knew him and modestly offered his services as a lawyer in the county seat of his native county. His indomitable courage, his untiring industry, his fine ability soon won the admiration of his people, and they called him to leadership in their fight to recapture their government from the hands of the scalawag and the carpetbagger. He entered the race for the State legislature against a negro and won the election. He was in the forefront in the restoration in the State of Anglo-Saxon supremacy and of constitutional government and order. He became one of that gallant band who in the valley of defeat turned the South from the graves of her dead and the ruins of her hearthstones and in a single generation raised her from dust and ashes, from desolation and darkness, and led her into the light of a new glory and the dawn of a better day.

After four years in his native county the call came to JOHN R. TYSON to enter the practice of law at Montgomery, the capital of the State. He accepted the call and became a member of the Montgomery bar, a bar as distinguished as any at that time in the country. It was the bar of William L. Yancey, once a distinguished Member of this House, the Patrick Henry of the Southern Confederacy, whose burning eloquence in Faneuil Hall temporarily transformed the fanatical Lloyd Garrisons and Harriet Beecher Stowes into southern sympathizers; of John A. Elmore, the constitutional lawyer, building fortresses of reason by the force of his logic; of Samuel F. Rice, "with his quaint thoughts and sayings filled with the pert and nimble spirit of mirth," chief justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama before reaching the age of 32; of George W. Stone, whose name for 40 years was written broad and clear on the pages of great decisions; of Thomas H. Watts, war Governor of Alabama and Attorney General of the Confederacy, the ardent and enthusiastic advocate, the magic of whose eloquence moved men and melted the hearts of judge and jury. It was the bar of Thomas G. Jones, the author of the present Code of Ethics of the American Bar Association, who as a beardless boy returning from Appomattox uttered those immortal words on the "lost cause," "I shall not injure the cause by arguing its justice," those words which electrified a dissevered Nation and joined the hands of Kansas, the State of John Brown, and of South Carolina, the Hotspur of the Union, for the successive reelection of a Democratic President for the first time since Andrew Jackson.

It was the bar of William A. Gunter, the golden link between the past and the present, "A man of perception keen and mind undimmed, and whose arms are filled with gathered sheaves." JOHN R. TYSON'S success at this bar was made manifest by the fact that at the age of 36 he was chosen to preside over it in the position of judge of the second or Montgomery circuit. For seven years he filled the position with honor and with distinction. So learned was he in the law, so fair in decision, so expeditious in the discharge of the business of the court, so faithful in duty that his name and fame spread throughout the confines of the State, and the people called him to a place on the Supreme Court. There he served for nearly 20 years and became chief justice of the court, defeating for that honored position an able and popular opponent in a hotly contested primary. He voluntarily retired from the bench to again enter the practice of the law in Montgomery. But he was not to remain out of the public service long. His services had been too distinguished, his ability was too marked. He was drafted by his friends to make the race for Congress from the second district, and was elected over a strong and capable opponent. Other gentlemen, who were his colleagues in this House, will testify this day to his services in this body. Permit me to call to memory what to my mind was the crowning service of his long and great career. I refer to his magnificent argument against the Dyer antilynching bill, in which he marshaled all the acumen of his wonderful intellect, all the store of his legal knowledge, all the wealth of his vast experience, and showed conclusively the unconstitutionality of that nefarious measure and sounded its death knell. As his friend and constituent, let me say that his services in this House were such as to quicken the admiration of his former foes for him and to increase the pride of his friends in him.

JOHN R. TYSON was a great jurist. He had drunk deep drafts of liberty from the commentaries of the fathers. He believed in his country. He understood its institutions and he knew its laws. He had faith in its mission. The Constitution was his chart and compass. It was his companion, his guide, and friend. As he went about his daily pursuits he always carried a copy of it with him. To the day of his death a worn and much-used volume of the great document was ever to be found on his person. His decisions on the court were usually short, terse, and compact. His power of analysis enabled him to go directly to the heart of the question and make his opinion clear in a few sentences. His decisions will go down through the years as guideposts along the highway of constitutional government and law. He was a man whom Daniel Webster fittingly described in his tribute to John C. Calhoun:

> He was calculated to be a leader in whatever association of political friends he was thrown. He was a man of undoubted genius and of commanding talent. His mind was both perceptive and vigorous. It was clear, quick, and strong.
> The eloquence of Mr. Calhoun, or the manner of his exhibition of his sentiments in public bodies, was part of his intellectual character. It grew out of the qualities of his mind. It was plain, strong, terse, condensed, concise, sometimes impassioned; still always severe. Rejecting ornament, not often seeking far for illustration, his power consisted in the plainness of his propositions, in the closeness of his logic, and in the earnestness and energy of his manner.

No man in public or in private life was more assiduous in the discharge of his appropriate duties than was Judge TYSON. No man wasted less of life in what is called recreation or employed less of it in any pursuits not connected with the immediate discharge of his duty. His was a dynamic personality, ever in action, ever moving on to the goal. He was an indefatigable worker. He toiled without respite, he labored without stint. He seemed to have no recreation but the pleasure of conversation with his friends. Out of the Chambers of Congress he was either devoting himself to the acquisition of knowledge pertaining to the subject of the duty before him, or else he was indulging in those social interviews in which he so much delighted. He was vigorous in conversation, and yet most gracious and charming among friends. His words were ever enlightening and carried conclusion in their sincerity. JOHN R. TYSON loved his friends. He not only sympathized with their aspirations, but he fostered them. He not only comprehended their hopes, but he labored for their realization. He not only partook of their joys, but he shared their sorrows. He had many friends, many among the great common people who ask nothing, who make no demands, need no assurances, and who never falter. They believed in him and they loved him. They loved him for his frank and manly dealings, for his modest and unassuming mode of life. They placed their trust in him, and he proved worthy of their confidence. For them he spent and was spent. He labored for their cause to the end. He kept the faith.

Years after the celebrated Battle of Thermopylæ, a traveler on visiting the spot found a monument with the simple inscription, "Stranger, go tell at Lacedæmon that we died in obedience to her laws." "Why is it," he asked, "that the names of those who fell are not inscribed on the stone?" "Because," was the proud reply, "it is impossible that any Greek should ever forget them." Even so it is with him of whom I speak. No State ever had a truer friend, no people a more affectionate champion, no cause a finer advocate, no principle a nobler defender. His acts are graven on the hearts of his people, and time has no power to obliterate the characters. Great men stand like solitary towers in the city of God. JOHN R. TYSON was one of these men.

Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when Judge TYSON came to Congress a new Member, on account of his strong personality, on account of his charming spirit, I was immediately attracted to him. We very soon became intimate and confidential friends. I was with him every day. He impressed me from the beginning as a man in every sense of the word of strong convictions and courageous conduct. My association with him was intimate, perhaps more intimate than it has been with any other Member of this House. My association with him was delightful and most profitable to me. He hated sham and he hated demagogy. I have seen him on this floor when some remarks were made that seemed to him to have a tinge of demagogy or insincerity when he would immediately rise and walk erectly from the Chamber. In the cloakroom he would denounce the sham an insincerity in unmeasured terms.

Judge TYSON had the courage of his convictions and never hesitated to express himself and to act as he thought to be right. He has often stated to me that a Member of Congress should not cringe and trail public sentiment; that it was the duty of a Member of Congress to inform the public and mold public sentiment. He not only had that independent courageous attitude, but as I knew him he was a most lovable man. Almost every day in our quiet conversations he would speak with affection and pride of his family. He was so proud of them and loyal to them.

I remember the last day of the session he sat for a long time and discussed public questions and public men, and as the day drew to a close he said to me, "I am not well. I am going away as soon as the session closes to-day and find out what my trouble is."

Gentlemen, his loss to me personally is grievous. I think of him almost every day as I come into this Chamber and especially in the cloakroom.

To his devoted and bereaved family I extend my personal, earnest, sympathetic condolence and remind them that their consolation is to be found in the fact that he left a distinguished and honorable career, one that points the way to finer and better things. What a glorious thought it is to them, the splendid achievements and the high character of the man. Gentlemen, Judge TYSON, of course, was no demigod, though a divinity encompassed his acts. Human weakness was present in him, yet the divine inspiration of duty so lifted him out of self as to make him the mighty champion of truth and right. He was in every sense of the term a man. He was my friend and I loved him.

Mr. STEAGALL took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, we have, according to a long and desirable custom, set apart this hour to pay fitting tribute to the life, character, and service of our late honored colleague the Hon. JOHN R. TYSON, a Representative from the second congressional district of Alabama. The mortality among the Members of the House for the last two years has been extremely shocking. It is evidence of the fact that the exactions of an arduous service takes its heavy toll in the lives of useful men.

I was profoundly shocked when upon an extended western trip last spring I learned of the death of Judge TYSON. It was known that during the closing days of the last Congress he was not in robust health, but none of us apprehended any serious culmination, and his passing away was not only a great surprise but the cause of genuine grief to those who admired and loved him.

Judge TYSON only served a little over one term in the House, but even that short tenure was sufficient to give him the opportunity to demonstrate that high order of ability and courage of conviction already so well known to the people of Alabama and the constituency he represented. He delivered in this forum only one or two extended arguments on pending legislation, but those who heard them were deeply impressed with his forceful and logical analysis and his profound convictions upon the subject he was discussing. For the rounding out of a long and honorable career it is to be very deeply regretted that his congressional service was so curtailed.

It was as a great jurist and advocate that our late colleague will be most remembered. His was inherently a great legal mind. Both as a practitioner of his profession and as a judge upon the nisi prius and supreme benches he was an assiduous and methodical student, which made it possible for him not only to understand legal principles with clarity of analysis but also to expound them with dextrous precision.

For a number of years he occupied the very responsible position of circuit judge, one which calls for the exercise of tact, patience, common sense, and learning. All of these attributes our deceased colleague possessed to a marked degree. His recognized judicial ability later won for him a place of high distinction as associate justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama. My State has long had the enviable distinction of producing judges on its highest tribunal whose legal opinions take very high place in the jurisprudence of the Nation. While serving as associate and for many years as chief justice of the supreme court Judge TYSON contributed to and amply sustained the exalted standard of his predecessors.

He was a man of courageous convictions. What he thought, he spoke. When he reached a definite and well-considered conclusion on a controversial matter he did not hesitate to declare it in positive and unreserved terms. He was not prodigal in his intimacies, but with cordial and dignified fidelity paid every debt of friendship which he owed.

That he was personally a popular man and preserved the loyalty of his admirers is proved by his unvarying success in his political contests. He represented here a district with many unusual historic legacies and proud traditions. He had as a constituency people of high purposes and honorable aspirations, and it is my privilege here to assert that in the person of Judge JOHN R. TYSON they had a Representative who measured up to the character and attainments of those whom he so capably served.

I do not desire to convey the impression by what I have just said that Judge TYSON was of the spirit of an aristocrat. His devotion to the plain people, to the rank and file of his fellows, was paramount and consistent. He believed in the aristocracy of intellect but always in the democracy of people, and I am sure that it was in the hearts of the toilers of his district that the grief over his departure was most poignant. He had learned too much of the real principles of equity to believe that there was any place either in society or government for the bestowal of special privileges.

To the surviving members of his family I desire to extend the expression of profound sympathy. They should find some measure of comfort in the reflection that the one for whom they grieve played a man's part in all the changing scenes in the drama of life, of one who wrought most worthily at the forge of events and left on the printed page of jurisprudence and in the annals of constitutional government a record of worthy and enduring achievement.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, it is well that the House has convened to-day in order that we may lay upon the altar of memory our tributes of love, respect, and admiration for our deceased colleague, Hon. JOHN R. TYSON, a Representative in Congress from the second district of Alabama, who died on Tuesday, March 27, 1923.

During the four sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress it was my privilege to be brought into most intimate relations of friendship with Judge TYSON almost daily. Living at the Driscoll Hotel, we were together in many a walk and ride. Each day that I was with him brought to me a fuller realization of his ability as a lawyer, of his high and honorable character, of his fearlessness, and of his intellectual honesty. No one could know him without being impressed with the greatness of the man.

Judge TYSON was a devoted husband and father. In his attitude toward his family he displayed the highest type of love and affection of a father and husband.

Judge TYSON was born in Alabama. His life was spent in the South. He loved the glorious traditions of the South. But the love for his State and the South was only excelled by his love for the Nation. No act or word of his would have ever caused one to doubt his patriotism.

His was a life of service to his State and country. His life was a record of accomplishment. Born in Lowndes County November 28, 1856, educated at Howard College, Marion, Ala., and Washington and Lee, Lexington, Va., at the age of 23 he commenced the practice of law at Haynesville, Ala. From this time until elected to Congress he was a successful and honorable practitioner at the bar, a member of the legislature, a circuit judge, an associate justice of the supreme court, then the chief justice of the supreme court. Retiring as chief justice, he again engaged in the practice of his chosen profession until elected to the Sixty-seventh Congress and then reelected to the Sixty-eighth Congress.

May I not be permitted to say that Judge TYSON was very fond of my State, North Carolina. His father was born in Pitt County, N. C., and moved to Alabama in the forties. Many times he expressed the desire to go to North Carolina on a visit to look up his relatives.

If he had lived, the State and the Nation would have continued to honor him. But dying, he left to Alabama a heritage for all time to come.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, the late Representative JOHN RUSSELL TYSON was born in Lowndes County, Ala., November 28, 1856; graduate of Howard College, Marion, Ala., and of Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va.; represented Lowndes County in the Legislature of Alabama in 1880; circuit court judge from 1892 to 1898; associate justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama from 1898 to 1906 and chief justice of that court from 1906 to February, 1909, when he resigned to resume the practice of his profession; was elected to the Sixty-seventh and Sixty-eighth Congresses from the second congressional district of Alabama, and died at Mayo Brothers' Hospital, Rochester, Minn., on the 27th day of March, 1923.

He was a faithful and consistent member and officer of the First Baptist Church of Montgomery, Ala., for more than 30 years, and maintained this relation to the end.

He was married to Mary Jordan, a daughter of Dr. James Jordan, of Lexington, Va., and is survived by his widow and the following children: George B. Tyson, of Barberton, Ohio; James J. Tyson, of Jacksonville, Fla.; Miss Martha J. Tyson, of Montgomery, Ala.; Mrs. B. Frank Noble, of Montgomery, Ala.; Mrs. Kenneth Murphy, of Washington, D. C.

Our late colleague, Judge JOHN RUSSELL TYSON, was a man among men—one of Alabama's most distinguished citizens—known of all for his native ability, his learning in the law, his splendid judicial mind, his patriotic fervor, his firmness of conviction, and devotion to duty. He never asked the people for an office that they did not give him. He was a man of deep convictions, never entertained half views of anything; whatever he did he did with his whole soul, and this was true of him in his religion as in other things.

For more than 30 years the people of Alabama honored him with their love and confidence by electing him to State and Federal offices, and if his life had been spared, he would have, in a short time, stood out in bold relief as a national figure; a leader in all that made for the welfare and good of his country and his fellow men. He also possessed, to a remarkable degree, the noble qualities as a family man, a faithful, tender, and devoted husband and father. His wife is a woman of culture, refinement, and great strength of character. Judge TYSON, like many other men in public life called upon from time to time to face perplexities and difficulties, was strengthened by the moral support and sympathy of his good wife at home. Her high ideals of life and public service were a constant inspiration to him.

It was well known to Judge TYSON's colleagues, for some time before his death, that he was in poor health and he was a great sufferer, but was never heard to complain.

As a member of the committee from the House I attended the funeral ceremonies in Judge TYSON's home city, Montgomery, Ala., the capital, and was profoundly impressed by the sincere evidence of sorrow, love, and respect manifested by the vast throng of people from every part of Alabama gathered there to honor him on that occasion, representing as they did every plane of social life. His remains, after arriving from Rochester, lay in state in the supreme court chamber at the capitol during the afternoon and night, and a special military guard of honor was posted in the chamber by order of the Governor of Alabama. The funeral services were held in the First Baptist Church, of which he was a member. About the casket were banked masses of beautiful, fragrant flowers, tributes from sorrowing neighbors and friends and his former associates of the supreme court and his colleagues, the Members of Congress from Alabama.

All in all JOHN RUSSELL TYSON was one of nature's great men. The effect of such a life, character, works, and faith will make its impression not only on the present generation but the generations to follow.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, perhaps no experience in public life is more interesting or profitable than that which comes to us in being brought into contact with men not only widely separated in physical distance but in the meeting of men whose traditions, whose political philosophy, whose social life have been ordered under entirely different conditions.

I could not but think, as a Member was recounting the struggles of JOHN R. TYSON against the forces that depressed the South immediately after the Civil War, of the atmosphere in which, as a young man, I myself was being molded in antagonism. Perhaps it is not improper to state here that even as a boy I never had any confidence either in the wisdom or the justice or the success of what was known as the force bill. I can understand how a sincere and honest man with every fiber of body and soul would battle among his fellows for what he conceived to be their rights.

It was not my privilege to be intimately associated with Mr. TYSON. He was a member of the committee to which I belonged. His clear, forcible analytical statements attracted the attention of every member of the committee. I saw him only now and then in the committee meetings. But no man could meet him without being impressed with the dignity, the honesty, the power of analysis, and the effective manner in which he made one understand that he had convictions and was able to state them.

I deem it fortunate for the State and the Nation that men of such mentality, wealth of experience, and splendid ability are drafted into public life.

Of the elements of leadership the first is wisdom. The long experience of his life upon the bench and in the practice of law gave him a very wide knowledge of institutional life. A man must not only have the knowledge but he must be strong. I judge from what those who knew Mr. TYSON intimately have said, that he was rugged, ever fearless, and strong. If one could add to that integrity, then leadership is perfect.

My own experience in the House has led me to believe that above all else we need the character and quality of men who know, who are strong, and who are honest.

I was particularly impressed with the statement of one Member to-day, that when the demagogue spoke JOHN R. TYSON resented it. Would to God there were more men who would resent it in the days that are to come. There is but one sad thing on an occasion of this kind, and that is too frequently men of the character of JOHN R. TYSON do not get the headlines, but the demagogue and not the statesman is made the measure of the character of men of Congress.

I learned to have the highest regard for Mr. TYSON in the very brief way I came in contact with him, and I am glad to-day to bear him this tribute of confidence and respect.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is a body of men active in their work, intent, and hard to get acquainted with. I say that from an experience of some 13 years and more. Therefore, when you do become really acquainted with a man it is the exception. I say that advisedly, and not in any discouragement or disparagement of the activities of the men who compose this body. It is the young man friendship, the boyhood friendship that lasts, and it is hard to get acquainted with and know a man after he has passed the 40 or 45 year period. Judge TYSON came from the most eastern part of this great Nation, and I come from the West. Our homes were separated by some 3,500 miles. Just what I do not know, but something brought Judge TYSON and myself together. I believe there was no man in the House during the length of time that Judge TYSON was here with whom I became more intimately acquainted, who knew more of me and I of him than was the case with Judge TYSON. I learned of his long and successful record as a public man. I knew what it stood for. I saw him here, I heard him speak individually, in the cloakroom, socially, and I heard him speak from the floor of the House. I learned to a greater or less degree what this distinguished man stood for. He stood for home and what was right. He stood for his city and his county. He stood for his State and all that it means. He represented and stood for what this Nation stands for. He was in favor of constitutional government. He believed in law and order. He was a strong advocate of the enforcement of our laws. He believed in equality. He believed in the right kind of living and advocated it by his words and his conduct. He was the kind of man for whom we are looking and longing.

While Judge TYSON passed away at a ripe age, yet it was in the zenith of his power. His family and his friends sustained a great loss, but it must be a satisfaction to his family, as it is to those of us who knew him well, that he left us, as I say, in the very zenith of his power, so that we may look back and remember him as he was.

In the death of Judge TYSON I felt a great personal loss. I know that his State felt the loss, and I know that my State felt the loss. Our Government has suffered a loss in the death of this man who stood for what we need now—courage and fortitude to stand for our convictions. Judge TYSON'S life ought to be known to all young men, as I believe it will be. They are the ones who are coming up soon to assume the responsibilities of our States and Nation, and they should follow the example of his life and ideas. His life and character should be an inspiration to all young men. It will show them that it is the right thing to be honest; that it is the right thing to be just; that it pays at all times to be courageous and stand for what is right, to be loyal and faithful to your family and to your friends, and, if necessary, at the sacrifice of your own life maintain the principles and the doctrines upon which this great country is founded.

Our sympathies go out to the family in their deep sorrow. We have lost a man who was of great service, and it is my prayer that what he stood for will make a lasting impression upon us all, so that his thoughts and ideas may be brought to their full fruition.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, "What is the secret of your life?" asked Mrs. Browning of Charles Kingsley. "Tell me, that I may make mine beautiful, too." He replied, "I had a friend."

In every age and country of the civilized world honor and homage have ever been paid to the illustrious dead. From palace halls and the walls of the humble cabin home look down the eyes long since turned to dust. In cathedral wall and niche, in college room and legislative hall, in private park and public square stand the sculptured forms of earth's chosen dead. Everywhere we find the love-inscribed slab, the rock-hewn tomb, the marble shaft, the granite monument, and here and there scattered over all the earth like forest leaves are graves without a stone, where love comes so oft to plant sweet flowers within its hallowed mold and water them with the tears of fond remembrance.

I first met Judge TYSON in the Sixty-seventh Congress. For a short time we were members of the same committee and we at once became warm friends. I was drawn to Brother TYSON by reason of his knowledge of the law, his experience as a judge, and his excellent legal mind. I found him a delightful companion, a lover of the law, a sincere and faithful friend, who had deep convictions of duty and the courage to follow the path of duty.

The sons of the blue and of the gray have not personal recollections of the Civil War. Judge TYSON was 5 years of age and I was 3 in 1861, and whatever we know of those tragic days is largely from the reading of history. I have not found, since I have been here in Congress, anything remaining of the old war spirit, any waving of the bloody flag, no personal recollections of the aftermath of the war, only the utmost kindliness and friendliness between the boys of the fathers in blue and the sons of the fathers in gray.

When I came to Congress in 1916 I had certain ideas about the South and the southern people—ideas influenced by my northern environment, by the prejudices growing out of the Civil War and the struggle of many years of the solid North against the solid South.

My seven years in Congress have disabused my mind of many false impressions. I have lost my ancient prejudices against the southern people. I have a new conception of the Members in Congress from the Southland. I have found my fellow Members south of the old Mason and Dixon line to be men of brains, broad minded, honest, with a love of home and country, and, above all, warm and valuable friends and delightful companions.

The events of the last few years in this Nation have obliterated the old lines of separation between the North and the South. The old war veterans, the blue and the gray, have nearly all passed over to the other side.

An artist has drawn a wonderful picture of an old Confederate soldier, with gray hair, tottering limbs, and bowed frame, watching with dim and aged vision a parade of old soldiers of both armies on Memorial Day, on their way to deck with flowers the common graves of both the blue and the gray, and the poet has put into the mouth of this old veteran these words of reminiscence:

When he had played the game, had laid
Our last lone stake, and all was through;
When those four years of blood and tears
Were done, we boys in gray were blue.

The years have passed, and now, at last,
I stand and watch the lines to-day,
And think how strange to see the change,
For all the boys in blue are gray.

Ah! blue relents and gray repents,
And fiercest passions seem but mean,
When blue and gray both pass away
And God blends over both his green.

I wish I had known more of JOHN TYSON. His unexpected passing out has taken something out of my own life. These words of mine seem almost cold and meaningless when he is not here to listen. We do not appreciate our friends while they mingle among us. They receive very few flowers from our hands while in life, and it seems so poor a tribute that I can lay upon JOHN TYSON'S grave to-day.

If I should die to-night,
My friends would call to mind with loving thought
Some kindly deed the icy hand had wrought;
Some kindly word the frozen lips had said,
Errands on which the willing feet had sped;
The memory of my selfishness and pride,
My hasty words, would all be put aside,
And so I should be loved and mourned to-night.

If I should die to-night,
Even hearts estranged would turn once more to me,
Recalling other days remorsefully;
The eyes that chill me with averted glance
Would look upon me as of yore, perchance,
And soften in the old familiar way.
For who could war with dumb unconscious clay?
So I might rest forgiven of all, to-night.

Oh, friends, I pray to-night
Keep not your kisses for my dead cold brow;
The way is lonely, let me feel them now;
Think gently of me; I am travel worn,
My faltering feet are pierced with many a thorn;
Forgive, oh, hearts estranged, forgive I plead;
When dreamless sleep is mine I shall not need
The tenderness for which I long to-night.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I listened with the deepest interest to the brilliant and very eloquent address upon the life and character of Judge TYSON by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], his able and very worthy successor. He spoke with an intimate knowledge of the notable career of our lamented colleague, and he and his other colleagues from Alabama have given us a very true and a very pleasing picture of the splendid life and the record of achievement of Judge TYSON.

It was not my privilege to know our deceased colleague, Hon. JOHN R. TYSON, until he became a Member of the Sixty-seventh Congress. But living in a State adjoining his I had long known something of his reputation as a lawyer and a jurist, for he had a long judicial career on the circuit bench and as associate justice and chief justice of the highest court of Alabama before he came to Congress. After he entered Congress it was my good fortune to be more or less closely associated with him, and we often discussed public matters, and particularly the legal and constitutional questions involved in measures pending before the House and upon which he was so splendidly qualified to speak. I formed a very high admiration for him, not only for his great legal learning and ability but also because of the innate honesty of the man and his very earnest desire to be right in the light of the obligations he had assumed and his duty to the people whom he represented.

His service here was cut short by his death, which occurred just as he was beginning his second term. But during his short career he impressed his colleagues with his great worth. Perhaps his most notable effort as a Member of the House was his speech attacking the constitutionality of the so-called Dyer antilynching bill. He was unavoidably absent on the day the measure was up for general debate, but his carefully prepared speech was presented to the House and printed in the RECORD. It was one of the ablest of the many able arguments made on the measure and attracted wide attention.

Judge TYSON abhorred lynching and all forms of lawlessness as much as any man I ever knew; but having been born and reared in the South, he had an intimate knowledge of its problems and difficulties, and he was very firmly convinced that the enactment of the bill into law would have the very opposite effect, not only in the South but throughout the country, from that which its sponsors professed to desire. He was accordingly very much agitated when it became apparent that the bill was likely to be passed by the House. He made a close study of its constitutionality, and became convinced that if passed it would be held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. The measure passed the House but failed in the Senate. If, unfortunately, it should ever be pressed for passage again, his speech will again serve a most useful purpose and prove a distinct service to his State and the country in exposing and emphasizing the unconstitutional features of that measure, which would increase the difficulty in controlling this lessening evil, and which is confined to no particular section of the country.

Judge TYSON was distinctly a friend of the masses of the people. He was familiar with their problems and sympathized with their difficulties, and he never hesitated to espouse their cause. He was a man of firm convictions; honest with himself and with others; positive in his own views and ready always to defend them. He despised sham and hypocrisy and never hesitated to condemn it. It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that a man of such high character and one so dependable should have been honored with the highest judicial position in his State and that he should have been chosen by his people as their Representative in Washington to enact laws for the protection and benefit of the Nation.

I last saw Judge TYSON a few days after the adjournment of Congress in March, 1923. I was leaving for home on that day and bade him good-by, expressing the hope that we would see each other again at the December session. He had been in ill health and said he was going to a hospital for a short period on the advice of his physicians and would then return to his home and friends in Montgomery.

I was very much shocked and grieved a few weeks later when I read in my home papers that Judge TYSON had been operated on and was in a critical condition. A day or so later, on March 27, 1923, the news came that he had passed over to that bourn from which no traveler ever returns—"God's finger touched him and he slept."

Judge TYSON died in harness. And for one who has long and honorably served his people, as Judge TYSON had served his, I can conceive of no more desirable way to lay down life's burdens.

Servant of God well done;
Rest from thy loved employ;
Enter the Master's joy.

After all, Mr. Speaker, for those who have done their duty here death is but a transition into a larger, better, and more glorious life where our opportunities will be greater and where we may fully enjoy the fruits of a well-spent life on earth. Judge TYSON is removed visibly from the outward eye, but the example he set and the service he rendered are engraved on the tablets of memory. He yet speaks eloquently and in the midst of us. Our souls tell us, in the language of the poet:

There is no death! The stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore,
And bright in Heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, the death of our distinguished colleague, Congressman JOHN R. TYSON, was a distinct loss to his State and to the Nation. It was a great personal loss to me. I had known and loved him since my early manhood. My first acquaintance with him began when as a young lawyer I practiced before him during a term of circuit court over which he presided in my home county of Dale. He was the judge of another circuit, but was sent to preside for one term of the circuit court for Dale County. His reputation had preceded him, and I was prepared for the high character of his work and the splendid impression which he made upon me and upon the people of the community. From that time on the people of Dale County were loyal friends and devoted admirers of Judge TYSON. He possessed not alone deep learning in the law and a wide range of general information but he had also in rare degree the qualities of common sense, courage, and honesty combined with an innate devotion to justice and fairness. The people, without regard to class or rank, recognized that in him there was always to be found one not only competent to pass upon the law but one devoted to essential justice and determined that justice should be administered to all. Everyone felt that when his rights were submitted for adjudication in the court over which Judge TYSON presided there could remain no cause for resentment or complaint.

Judge TYSON was born of aristocratic environment and of wealthy parents, as wealth is counted in Alabama. Yet nature had so molded his mind and heart that his sympathy was always first for the common man. He enjoyed educational opportunities very uncommon among the people of our State during the years following the Civil War, which constituted the period of his youth, and he availed himself to the utmost of his opportunities. He manifested in early youth the habits of industry that characterized his entire life. He attended primary school in Lowndes County and later the public schools in the city of Selma, and then graduated at Howard College. To prepare himself more completely and extensively for a career as a lawyer he attended Washington and Lee University, in which institution he maintained the splendid record which had marked his course in school theretofore. Upon the completion of his education he went back home and began life as a young lawyer in the little town of Haynesville, the county seat of Lowndes County, the home of his boyhood. Soon he was elected to the legislature, in which body he served with distinction and gave wide impression of his rare capabilities and character. A little later he moved to Montgomery, the capital of the State, and entered upon the practice of law in that city. He soon won high place as a member of the bar in Montgomery, a bar that had enviable standing throughout the country at that time. Soon after his removal to the city of Montgomery he was called to the office of circuit judge, in which position he served for a term of six years.

His service as circuit judge gained for him such wide esteem throughout the State that as a result he was summoned to the office of chief justice of the supreme court. His service as chief justice was highly gratifying to the bar and pleasing to the people of the State. He won high rank among the judges of the country and his opinions were held in high regard far and wide. He was reelected chief justice of the supreme court. He won a handsome victory over a very able and beloved lawyer of our State in a Democratic primary election, being the first chief justice of the supreme court of the State to be nominated in a primary. Judge TYSON was not an office seeker in the ordinary sense of the term. His candidacy for office was always in response to the appeals of his friends. He was of positive, courageous, aggressive temperament. He had strong convictions and had no desire to conceal them. No one was ever in doubt as to how he stood on any live question. His strong personality rebelled at the restraints of judicial office. For this reason he resigned the office of chief justice of the supreme court when it was well recognized on all hands that no one could have defeated him for the honor. It was not of his seeking, nor in pursuit of any mature purpose of his life, that he entered the contest for congressional honors. Such an undertaking was entirely out of line with his life's plans. Conditions arose in the midst of which he felt the call of his friends was such that it was his duty to become an aspirant. He entered the contest against a very able and highly esteemed Member of Congress whose service had received national recognition and won a handsome victory in the primary election and was, of course, elected in the general election which followed. Two years later he won an overwhelming victory against a worthy and highly esteemed opponent.

Judge TYSON'S brief career as a Member of Congress reflected the same fidelity, courage, and devotion to principles that had marked his prior public life. His great learning, wonderful energy, and strong personality soon made deep impression among his associates here. He endeared himself to all of us by his kindly and kingly qualities of heart and mind. His hold upon the people of his district was such that no prudent politician would have expected to accomplish his defeat under any ordinary circumstances. His growth and promotion were gradual. Every step forward in his career was founded upon previous service and a growing acquaintance with the people of the State. He was never elected to any office as the result of abnormal political developments or temporary political excitement. The foundation of his successful career was laid during the early years of his service as circuit judge in the district embracing the counties of the second congressional district. It was this service which gave the people an opportunity to know him intimately, to understand his sympathies, to learn the promptings of his heart, and to test the quality of his character and courage. It was then that he made the acquaintance and formed the friendships upon which he relied for the remarkable success which crowned the later years of his life. He was never defeated. There was no office within the gift of the people of Alabama which he might not with reasonable hope have aspired to fill, and there was no honor within their gift which they would not have been glad to bestow upon him.

Judge TYSON was one of the great Alabamians of his day. He loved his State; he loved her people; he was proud of their history and happy in prophetic faith in their future achievements and glory. He stood for all that was best. He was grounded in the fundamental faith of the fathers. He was proud of our Government. He understood its laws and institutions. He loved courage and character and despised hypocrisy and cowardice. He never stopped to count the cost before taking position on any great question or when any moral issue was involved. He was no timeserver. He was a leader who always sought and found a place at the front. His work will live long after those who sit here to-day shall have passed away.

He sleeps in the soil of his native State in the beautiful cemetery at Montgomery on the banks of the Alabama. His grave will long be a shrine to his friends and fellow Alabamians who loved him, and who will keep his memory green through the passing years:

Not gold, but only man can make
A people great and strong;
Brave men who, for truth and honor's sake,
Stand fast and suffer long;
Brave men who work while others sleep—
Who dare when others fly—
These build the nation's temple deep
And lift its pillars to the sky.

Mr. ALMON, Speaker pro tempore, resumed the chair.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound reverence that I stand here to-day to express my encomiums to the memory of a friend. Among the first with whom I became acquainted when I entered the House of Representatives was Congressman JOHN R. TYSON. The casual acquaintance was destined to ripen into a warm and strong friendship. There were thoughts and ideals in common, hopes and aspirations for service upon which we were agreed, and last but not least there were recollections and associations of youth that were familiar to each though not contemporaneous. He completed his education at Washington and Lee University, I at the Virginia Military Institute, each being located in the town of Lexington, Va., situated in a peaceful and prosperous valley, with the Allegheny Mountains ranging to the west and the Blue Ridge to the east. We had known the same fields and hills and valleys and brooks. We had bathed in the same streams. We had known the same people and visited the same homes. We had attended the same churches and heard the gospel of our Lord expounded by the same ministers. It was but natural, therefore, that we should have at once become close friends.

To the town of Lexington, incident to the two great and historical educational institutions, there had been gathered together an unusual number of intellectuals, and thus there was a culture and refinement reflected to a large degree in a society not interrupted by the vulgarity and urge of a money-crazed center. His alma mater bore the name of the Father of his Country. To this, after the great war between the States, was added the illustrious name of Lee, whose mortal remains make sacred its soil. To some known as the West Point of the South, the name of Francis H. Smith, its founder and director for half a century, is indelibly linked, an intellectual giant who towered above his fellows even as House Mountain rises above the range of which it is a part. Stonewall Jackson, the right arm of Robert E. Lee, was of its faculty and here, likewise, rest his mortal remains near to those of his chief.

John Letcher, the war Governor of Virginia, who led his State to cast its lot with the Confederacy, lived and died within this hallowed spot, as did General Pendleton, whose name is upon the honor roll of Confederate fame. Randolph Tucker, for many years a Member of this body, immortalized his name as an expounder of our Constitution, lived and died an honored and beloved citizen of Lexington. No town, no city, no soil in the State, in the South, in the Nation, holds such a wealth of illustrious makers of history as does this peaceful city in the valley of Virginia. In the shadow of this environment, around which was built so largely the traditions of the South, the youth, JOHN R. TYSON, closed the first era of his career and entered the second clothed with a loyalty, a patriotism, a culture, a refinement, that was destined to lead him into positions of the greatest trust, highest honor, an unadulterated faith and affection of his countrymen. This is not an idle statement or praise for a departed friend. History will record the fact that never did he fail to respond to the call for service in his party, his State, or his Nation. That he did not fail in his duty to his neighbor is evidenced in the loyalty and confidence with which they followed his lead, and may I add as an additional proof of this unsullied record that never, never was he denied any position of public trust for which he offered himself. Serving first in the general assembly of his State and later as president of the Montgomery city council, he laid the foundation for the highest honor in the judicial branch of his Government within the gift of his people. In 1906 he became chief justice of the supreme court of his State and later resigned to become division counsel for the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad. He was not permitted, however, to remain in private life. In 1920 he was drafted to represent his State in the National Congress, and here he served till the end. Never did he depart from the paths of rectitude or betray the trust of those whom he served. Next to the State of his nativity he loved Virginia and her people, and I think that this manifest devotion was inspired largely by the atmosphere of his alma mater, but more particularly to the fact that he married into one of Virginia's most illustrious families. A kind and affectionate husband and father, the vacant chair is to his loved ones a daily reminder of an irreparable loss. My sympathies are with those of his fireside who will grieve most at his loss.

Amidst the duties faithfully performed to his family, his friends, and his State he failed not in the service of his God. A member of the Baptist Church he was judged and not found wanting. So when the Master beckoned and the bugle sounded the last call without a murmur he surrendered his service and went down into the river of eternity.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the home friends of the lamented Judge JOHN RUSSELL TYSON deeply appreciate the beautiful tributes paid him to-day by his colleagues from other States who early learned to know his value and worth. All of us have listened with interest to the remarkably eloquent and just tribute paid him by his distinguished successor, Mr. HILL, who, better than any other Member, is qualified to speak, not only because of his intimate acquaintance with Judge TYSON but because of his intimate acquaintance with so many men and women who have known Judge TYSON from earliest boyhood. I wish only to emphasize some deductions that follow from Mr. HILL'S address.

We know that the record of a generous, serviceable life runs like a vine of evergreen round the memory of our departed friend. He lived his life fully, faithfully, and greatly, and has made a rich offering to all future time. He knew the game of life as few men did, and he played that game with fairness to himself and fellows, with a rare courage, fortitude, faith, and confidence. He learned early, with patience, the art of directing his life to noble ends and purposes, and always with a due regard for the privacy, rights, and opinions of others. While he always strove for the highest legitimate reward of merit, ambition, and opportunity in his sphere of activities, yet he was ever ready to lend a kind and helpful hand to all who needed encouragement in life's struggle. He was modest and humble in success, never unduly egotistical, nor, on the other hand, did he make the mistake of disparaging self.

He was a true, loyal friend, a genial, helpful companion, with a broad, honest charity, born of an accurate understanding of the shortcomings of himself, as well as of others.

In conversation with him just after he came to Congress, after referring to his remarkable career on the bench, his popularity in the State, and especially in the judicial circuit over which he presided before his elevation to the Supreme Court, I remarked that this popularity was, in my opinion, due to his broad, accurate, sympathetic knowledge of men. He modestly replied that if what I said of him was even partly true, credit was due to a sincere effort on his part to recognize and apply the old common-sense truth, which Seneca long ago uttered:

> If we wish to be just judges of all things, we must at least understand that no man is without fault; that no man is found who can acquit himself, and if any claim to be innocent, he speaks in reference to a witness and not to his conscience.

As you study his public career, whether as a citizen, lawyer, judge, or legislator, you will find that in his dealings with his fellows he has recognized and practiced the charity which that truth so strongly enjoins.

Some one to-day has referred to him as a man of strong convictions, and that when once he determined what his course should be he was unwavering in following it to the end. While that is absolutely true, yet he was a most approachable man, willing always to hear those with whom he differed. I think we can say of him what Watterson said of another great American:

He would compromise war, he would compromise glory, he would compromise everything at the point where hate comes in, where misery comes in, where life begins its descent into the valley of the shadow, but he would not compromise the right, he would not compromise the truth.

When once he felt that he knew the right, that he knew the truth, he was, indeed, unbending, yet ever willing to grant a respectful hearing to those who differed.

Truly then can it be said of him that his life and his character are an enduring treasure, and that the memory and influence of men of his type constitute the towers of strength in our civilization. My colleague Mr. STEAGALL has well said that Judge TYSON believed in the fundamentals on which our Government is founded. Let me add he also believed that a Republic like ours is not only the best but the only form of human society; that the common individual, willing to render helpful service, is the best asset of the Nation; that all power should rest on fitness to rule; and that the sole object of all power should be the public good. To him service to community, to State, and Nation was indeed not only a duty but a glory quite sufficient in itself.

While his body has gone from us, yet the actualities of his life and his dreams of high service and of human duty will ever remain.

He will be forever an influence,
A memory, a goal, a high example,
A thought of honor in some noble heart,
Part of his country's treasure and renown,
Oft giving courage unto souls that strive.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it has long been a custom of Congress when death has claimed one of its Members, to pause from daily activity and give friends of the deceased an opportunity to speak a word of eulogy in his memory. In the discharge of that solemn duty we have met to-day, and I am indebted to the Alabama delegation in Congress for this opportunity, as the friend of our late colleague, Judge JOHN RUSSELL TYSON, to pay his memory a sincere and modest tribute.

It was not my privilege to know Judge TYSON until he became a Member of the Sixty-seventh Congress, but during his brief service in this body it was my pleasure to be rather closely associated with him. In addition to our daily contact in this Chamber, we were members of the same committee; we generally sat side by side in its deliberations, and were frequently associated together in other places.

I shall not dwell at length nor in detail upon his life or public service. This has been done and more will be said by others far more eloquent and better qualified than I am to do it. But it gives me pleasure to testify to his splendid service while in Congress. He possessed moral and political courage in a marked and high degree, and combined with it both virtue and energy, so necessary in public life.

As a Member of the Congress he was not disposed to talk much, but his position regarding any matter and upon which he spoke could never be misunderstood. He never misled anyone, and he always took a position on great public issues. In the language of the poet it may well be said of him:

He was a friend of truth, of soul sincere;
In action faithful, and in honor clear;
Who broke no promise, served no private end;
Sought no title and forsook no friend.

He was that type of man who would have impressed himself upon any community, in any day or generation. His influence will live to bless those with whom he came in contact, and the lives of many yet unborn will be shaped by his influence left upon this world. For such an individual there is no death. For him it may be truly said:

There is no night; the stars go down
To rise upon another shore,
And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
They shine forevermore.

In conclusion, may I express a word of sympathy to the bereaved family and say to them that I, too, have lost a valued friend?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult, indeed, to properly describe the loss we have sustained in the death of our lamented colleague, Judge JOHN R. TYSON. It is impossible by the use of mere words to fully express for loved ones he has left behind our tender regard and deep sympathy. I can not, however, forego the privilege of joining the Members of the House of Representatives in paying tribute to the life and character of one of Alabama's most distinguished sons. On November 28, 1856, JOHN RUSSELL TYSON was born of that splendid cavalier stock which came from the Carolinas to Alabama in the early days and there laid the foundation of a great civilization. His father, a man of wealth, culture, and great intellectual power, a large land and slave owner, settled in Lowndes County soon after Alabama was admitted to the Union. Born of refined and highly intellectual parentage, Judge TYSON inherited those traits which characterized the southern gentleman of the old school. He loved the old South with all of its noble traditions, and in his early years played a conspicuous part in maintaining the integrity of our civilization during those trying times which followed in the wake of the War between the States, when the best blood of the South was put to its bitterest test.

Judge TYSON was probably more fortunate than many young men of his day and generation in that, despite the gloom and conditions of poverty which hung like a pall over our section of the South, he was able to seek the advantages of an education at Washington and Lee University. He not only seized these opportunities, but by his constant application, his energy, and ambition to be of service he developed even in youthful years into a splendid lawyer, a most useful man, and an outstanding figure in public affairs in Alabama.

At the early age of 24 years he was a member of the Alabama Legislature. Soon after moving to the city of Montgomery its people recognized his ability and called him to serve as one of its governing officers for many years. In 1892 he was elected judge of the second judicial circuit, where his service was characterized by his eminent fairness and sound judicial decisions for a period of six years. From 1898 to 1906 he was associate justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama, and in 1906 was elected by the people of Alabama chief justice of the supreme court. From this high position he voluntarily retired in 1909 to enter the practice of his chosen profession. In 1920 he was again called into public service and elected a Member of the House of Representatives.

While to-day our hearts are bowed in grief over his death, we can find some consolation in the fact that the record of his earthly pilgrimage is replete with honor and attainment, with good deeds well done. It may be truly said of him that he was one of those who—

Lived well, laughed often, and loved much; who gained the respect of intelligent men and the love of little children; who filled his niche and accomplished his task.

Judge TYSON was easily one of the really great jurists of his day. His opinions during a period of almost a quarter of a century abound with the soundness of his reason and originality, the keenness of his intellect, and the logic of his conclusions. He loved the law, and no man ever had greater respect for constituted authority. No man cherished a firmer faith in our constitutional form of government. His speech in the House on January 18, 1922, upon the constitutional questions involved in the so-called antilynching bill was a masterpiece of matchless ability, a profound study, and a careful analysis of stupendous, intricate legal questions.

On June 11, 1922, Judge TYSON delivered a lecture in the First Baptist Church of Montgomery upon "Obedience to law," which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 23, 1922. A reading of this lecture gives us an insight into his love of the law, his recognition of its supremacy, his intelligent understanding of its orderly processes, and his reverence for that field in which the principal activities of his life were centered. I quote a few sentences of that lecture in order that you may know what I mean when I say he loved the law:

There can be no observance of and obedience to law unless there is a recognition of its supremacy and a reverence for it. All beings have their law, the Deity has His law, the material world has its law, superior intelligences have their law, the beasts of the field have their laws, and man has his laws. They emanate from God and radiate from the sun to the circling edge of creation. Indeed, the mighty law giver has subjected himself unto the law. The virtue of nature is obedience to law. Burke has said, "There is but one law for all, namely, that law which governs all laws—the law of our Creator, the law of humanity, justice, equity—the law of nature and of nations." Let us understand and appreciate that in forming the Union sanctified by the adoption of the Constitution of the United States our fathers recognized and sought to establish and promote man's relation to God, to himself and his fellow man to ordain and establish that liberty secured by governmental power, under which each citizen shall be forced to so conduct himself and so use his own property as not necessarily to injure another.

The death of this distinguished Alabamian has deprived his State and Nation of a most valuable public servant. He was a tender and loving father, a kind and faithful husband, an upright and God-fearing man. He was brave and courageous in his private and public life. I know he was not afraid to answer the last roll call. I believe he could say with Tennyson:

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar,
When I put out to sea,

But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound and foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep
Turns again home.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embark;

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crost the bar.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, the Congress of the United States is in the midst of the busiest period of the session. The end of the session is fast approaching, and every Member is fully occupied with the various matters in which he is especially interested for his constituents and busily engaged every day with pressing legislative business before the committees or here upon the floor of the House of Representatives.

But it is fitting, my friends, that in the midst of the performance of important duties we turn aside for a time from the consideration of business and pause to-day to pay our respectful and loving tribute to the memory of our departed friend and colleague, Hon. JOHN RUSSELL TYSON.

As a friend of his who has had the pleasure of having been closely associated with him here in Congress, I wish to say that I deem it a great privilege now to be permitted to add my humble, though heartfelt, word to the sentiments that have been so ably and beautifully expressed by my colleagues upon this occasion.

Judge TYSON was a fearless man; he was an honest man; his was an admirable and a lovable character. One thing about him that always impressed me forcibly was his way of looking quickly through the form and to the substance of any matter, his way of looking for the real truth in any situation, and his unhesitating way of arriving directly at his decision when once he did grasp the substantial facts of anything which was before him for his consideration. And, furthermore, he was not only a man of strong convictions but he had the courage of his convictions to a marked degree. As I think of this courageous man I think of the lines of Babcock's beautiful poem:

Be strong!
We are not here to play, to dream, to drift;
We have hard work to do and loads to lift.
Shun not the struggle, face it; 'tis God's gift.

Be strong!
Say not the days are evil—who's to blame?
And fold the hands and acquiesce. O shame!
Stand up, speak out bravely, in God's name.

Be strong!
It matters not how deep intrenched the wrong,
How hard the battle goes, the day how long;
Faint not; fight on! To-morrow comes the song.

As a younger man who was his stanch admirer and who looked to him with full confidence for good advice and friendly counsel, I say without hesitation that his honesty of purpose, his earnestness of effort, and his fearless thoroughness of action were the characteristics that seemed to me to stand out most prominently in his life as he labored here, consistently and conscientiously, for his people whom he loved so well and whom he served so ably.

Now, to the relatives of our departed friend and brother, let me say that I realize full well how inadequate are mere spoken words and phrases at a time like this. But I do want to say that my heart goes out to them in tenderest sympathy in their hour of grief, and I want them to know that I do feel deeply for them.

While we realize that the loved ones in Judge TYSON's family circle have, of course, suffered the greatest loss, we know that in the passing of this good man we, too, have sustained a great loss in that we have lost a friend. And while we mourn the loss of this devoted husband, this kind father, and this good friend, it is good to know that the bereaved relatives, and we, as friends, may find highest consolation in the knowledge that when to the brave spirit of JOHN R. TYSON came the summons to join the innumerable caravan that moves to that mysterious realm where each shall take his chamber in the silent halls of death he went not like the quarry slave at night, scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed by an unfaltering trust, approached his grave like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of JOHN R. TYSON, of Alabama. It was my good fortune for eight years to reside in Montgomery, Ala., which was the home of Judge TYSON. There I had opportunity to see him as a public man and in private life, and it was there that I came to know him, and to know him was to admire him, was to love him, and is to-day to cherish his memory. As it is with me so is it with tens of thousands of people in Alabama, because Judge TYSON was a man among men. He was chosen by the people of Alabama to high stations in life, and he filled them all with distinction. He voluntarily gave up a high position, a position which doubtless he could have held as long as he lived, and retired to the practice of his chosen profession. That in itself shows that he was not a timeserver; that he was not a self-seeking man. You could not characterize him in the terms of a politician, and thus he was so looked upon by the people of his State. In time of war men of certain characteristics are chosen by their fellow men to lead our armies to victory, and so, in times of reconstruction, men of peculiar genius and distinction are chosen by their fellow men to help right the ship of state, and JOHN R. TYSON was so chosen by his fellow men to represent them in the Halls on Congress in 1920. Those were fearful times in the history of our country, and the people of the second district of Alabama knew what type of man Judge TYSON was. You had but to come in contact with him; you had but to look him face to face; you had but to look into his eyes to see emanating from his soul the vision that springs from a strong, positive character. He was a man of marked personality. He stood for truth, he stood for courage, he stood for candor, and when he came to Congress as a Representative of his people he came here to work; he came here to serve.

He came here to serve, and he gave all that there was in him for his people and his country. Look at it from whatever standpoint you may, and if a man gives his all, then he has given the most that a man can give, and that is what JOHN R. TYSON did. He gave his life for his country; and I am glad to-day to stand as his friend, as one whom he welcomed here in this Chamber. Well do I remember with what delight he introduced me here to his comrades, and he took special care in talking to me as a father talks to his son, telling me, as a new Congressman, of some of the duties which were before me, and I remember that after I had gone away for a short visit and returned how sad I was that my friend had gone. But his spirit still lives. There is nothing lost in this universe, and to-day his spirit is keeping vigil with us in this Chamber, and his spirit will ever live and shine in eternity.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, it was my pleasure to meet and know Judge JOHN R. TYSON soon after he assumed his duties as a Member of the Sixty-seventh Congress. To me he was a man of interesting character and of strong and pleasing personality. In agreement or in disagreement he always commanded respect and confidence. His long and honorable service on the bench of his State no doubt was responsible for the peculiar judicial mold of mind that stamped his every act and utterance. He thought judicially and he acted judicially, and his utterances always seemed marked by high judicial attainment.

While I was thus the more impressed with the legal and judicial distinction to which he seemed to be so clearly entitled, I fully expected to see him rise to the command of an equal distinction as the chosen Representative of his people in this House. Had his life been spared, no doubt he would. His was the training, his was the maturity of judgment, his was the character that preeminently qualified him for the new field of public service upon which he had entered. His brief service here gained for him the confidence, love, and esteem of many friends, and in his death the country lost a strong and worthy man.

While the legislative capabilities which Judge TYSON may have possessed were not afforded the opportunity of fully revealing themselves, nevertheless the effect of his very presence here upon his colleagues and associates was in the right direction. It was serious, earnest, and inspiring; and if a long service here had revealed in him any lack of legislative capacity whereby he should have been kept from the very forward ranks of legislative distinction, it would have been compensafed for by the influence of his presence and its inspiration to his colleagues to make the most of their respective talents in the interest of the public good.

The opportunities of his brief service here were curtailed somewhat by failing health; and his service was rendered brief by the hand of death. The spirit of our friend still lives and the potency of its influence for good can not perish.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, Mr. BOWLING is unavoidably absent to-day through illness and I understand Members have the right to extend their remarks.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, if the element of friendship might be considered a just reason for imposing myself upon the House at this time, I should feel amply justified in arising to pay my tribute of respect to my distinguished friend, the late lamented JOHN R. TYSON, of Alabama.

We entered Congress at the same time and served together on the same committee, where we sat side by side for more than two years, and my association with him confirmed the high estimate which I had already placed upon him by reading his opinions rendered while he was chief justice of the supreme court of his State.

He possessed those sterling qualities of mind and heart which make up the true American. He believed in orderly government and in orderly procedure in legislation, and maintained a profound reverence for the precedents, laws, traditions, and institutions which have contributed so largely to the upbuilding of this great Republic, as well as to the development of our Anglo-Saxon civilization.

After listening to the eloquent and forceful speech of my distinguished friend, Mr. HILL of Alabama, who succeeded Judge TYSON in the House, I feel like following the judicial course, and merely submitting my concurrence in that splendid address.

But my intimate association with Judge TYSON, which developed a most intimate friendship between us, prompts me to go further, not to extol his great achievements as a lawyer, jurist, and statesman, but to register my appreciation of those splendid qualities which rendered Judge TYSON among the foremost citizens the State of Alabama has produced.

It has been pointed out here that Judge TYSON died far from home and among strangers. That fact kindles within us a feeling of profound sympathy, not only for our departed friend, but for his loved ones as well. But I have often remarked that three of the least things to be considered in summing up the life of a man are where he was born, where he died, and where he was buried. One of these is just as important as the other.

Abraham Lincoln was born in abject poverty in an interior county of Kentucky, died at the hands of an assassin in the District of Columbia, and his body lies buried in the State of Illinois. Yet he occupies a position of supreme preeminence in the world's estimate and in the Nation's love.

Jefferson Davis, the great chieftain of the Confederacy, was born in the same county of Kentucky as was Lincoln, died on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico in the bosom of the sunny South, and his body lies buried in the city of Richmond, the capitol of the ill-fated Confederacy, of which he was the only president. His name and his fame are growing brighter as time goes by, and as one distinguished orator has said:

> When another hundred years have passed away, no intelligent voice will fail to praise him, and no patriotic hand will refuse to place a laurel wreath upon his radiant brow.

Alexander the Great, who is said to have become a world conqueror at the age of 22, and to have died at 30 lamenting that there were no more worlds to be subdued, was born in Europe, died in Asia, and was buried in Africa. He stands out to-day as one of the most powerful personalities of all times.

Napoleon Bonaparte, the most fascinating figure of all history, that invincible son of genius who trampled with colossal strides the very map of Europe under his imperial heel, was born on the island of Corsica in the Mediterranean Sea, died in exile on the Isle of St. Helena, and his body rests to-day beneath the soil of sunny France; while he occupies the first place in the hearts of the French people, as well as the highest rank among the military leaders of the world.

The Savior of Mankind was born in a manger in Bethlehem, died on the Cross of Calvary, his body arose from the dead, and his name became a world-conquering power.

It is the life that counts!

The mere fact that Judge TYSON died among strangers, while exciting our sympathy, does not distract our thoughts from his great achievements or his splendid qualities as a citizen, a jurist, a statesman, and a man.

In his death the Nation lost one of its most valuable citizens, and the State of Alabama lost one of her worthiest and most distinguished sons, whose work will live as long as the Nation shall endure.

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Speaker, the honored name of Judge JOHN R. TYSON will live long in the history of Alabama, for he combined those elements of high character, strong individuality, and intellect which make men great. His public career extended over many years, as judge of the circuit court, associate justice and chief justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama, and as a Member of Congress. In all these places of honor and trust he added luster to his own fame and made a splendid contribution of service to his native State.

Judge TYSON was a native Alabamian, born and reared to manhood in the famous and cultured county of Lowndes, educated at Howard College, then and now one of the leading educational institutions of the State. He early chose the law for his profession, and, realizing that the law is a jealous mistress, he devoted all his energy to the study of jurisprudence, and thus became a recognized leader at the bar.

While a member of the supreme court he wrote many opinions, some of them leading cases in our State, and upon these his fame will chiefly rest. His opinions are characterized by a thorough grasp of the principles involved, a logical process of thought in reaching his conclusions, and all of them written in a pleasing and expressive literary style, attractive to read as well as being sound in exposition of his views. His service in Congress was short, death overtook him when he was but upon the threshold of what promised to be a great congressional career. His chief contribution to national legislation was his speech on the antilynching bill which passed the House but failed in the Senate. This speech is really more than a speech, it is a carefully prepared opinion of the constitutional phases of the bill written by a great constitutional lawyer. If this bill is ever again presented to Congress the name of Judge TYSON will be often recalled, for in his analysis of the bill he touched every phase of it and with such profound thought, resistless logic, and inexorable analysis he has left nothing to be said.

In his personal and private relations Judge TYSON was a prince among men. He had a noble character; he was a true friend; he had a profound contempt for everything that was low, mean, and wrong; the beautiful things of life attracted him; he had an aspiration for the true and the good and all of his efforts in an active life were given to the firmer establishment of the best things of our civilization. He left behind him a host of friends who will keep his memory green, who will cherish their recollections of the friends now gone, and who will draw courage and inspiration from a contemplation of his many virtues.

My personal acquaintance with him really began during the campaign of 1906, when he was nominated as the Democratic candidate for the chief justiceship. That was a memorable battle in the history of Alabama politics; it was waged by two great men, the then chief justice seeking reelection, and Judge TYSON, an associate justice, who was asking advancement to the chief place. Each of these men was a worthy opponent of the other; both learned in the law, both noble in character, both fighters by instinct, and both of tremendous energy. That Judge TYSON emerged as the victor in this contest was highly complimentary to him and stamped him for all time as one who held a secure place in the hearts of his people. As a friend of the aspirations of Judge TYSON in this campaign I took a deep interest in his cause, was often thrown with him, and there began a friendship between us which lasted until his untimely death and which I shall ever cherish. I remember the last conversation I had with Judge TYSON. It was on Saturday night, the 3d of March, 1923. We had a long night session that evening preparatory to the adjournment of Congress on the following day at noon; the judge had not been in good health for some time and for that reason had been unable regularly to attend the sessions. On this night we sat together for quite a while, and he talked very interestingly of his boyhood days, his struggle at the bar, and various experiences of his busy life. He told me a number of interesting stories of some of the great men with whom he had been associated—Henry Clay Thompkins, Judge Thomas G. Jones, Governor Watts—and other great lawyers with whom he struggled for the mastery. Finally he adverted to his health, speaking of his continued illness, but looking forward hopefully to recovery. He evidently did not realize that his end was so near, for he spoke of his plans for the summer and how he expected to recuperate his health by a trip to the seashore. We parted late at night, and that was the last time I saw my friend. Leaving Washington on the 5th of March for a trip to Panama, I heard no more from him until the news came of his death about three weeks afterwards.

In common with all his friends, I deeply mourn his departure. He is gone from us, but that great intellect is shining on the farther shore where all the good meet again. We will never hear his voice again nor see his face, but his example lives, calling us to higher and better things and nobler and more glorious aspirations. Peace to his ashes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of Judge TYSON I feel a deep sense of personal loss.

I first became acquainted with Judge TYSON when he became associate justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama in 1898. At that time I was in active practice as a lawyer and had frequent occasion to appear before the supreme court. From the beginning I was impressed with his high character, judicial temperament, and his strong intelligence. His decisions were vigorous, direct, and clear. They showed a natural love of right and justice, an avoidance of technicalities, sophistry, and evasiveness, and displayed admirable qualities of both mind and heart. Led by my admiration for his qualities, I soon found myself seeking a personal intimacy with him. A friendship was formed which continued through his elevation to chief justice of the court and until he retired from the bench.

After Judge TYSON'S resignation as chief justice I did not see him frequently until he entered the House as a Representative in the Sixty-seventh Congress. Our former friendship was at once renewed. I found myself almost daily seeking a seat at his side and counseling with him upon the business before the House. As a legislator, I found in him certain traits which I had not recognized in him as a judge. There was always a clear perception of the principle involved and an unfailing adherence to fundamental democracy. In Judge TYSON I was reminded of the attitude of Jefferson, Madison, Henry, and the other champions of popular government who labored together in founding the Republic. There was in him a strong and instinctive love of fair play, of the political equality which constitutes justice, and of fundamental Americanism as expressed in the preamble to the Declaration of Independence. He was an ardent believer in personal liberty and of the fundamental rights of free speech, trial by jury, local self-government, and of the rights of human beings as superior to property rights.

It was this aspect of Judge TYSON'S character that had not previously been fully disclosed to me. As I saw it clearer each day in our intimate association in the House, the affection in which I had held him deepened and he became my best-loved friend among all the Members. I knew the environment from which he came—a scion of the old slave-holding class, a people proud, brave, generous, and intelligent, but not marked in their recognition of the need for progress and for social reform. I had not expected that he would be different from others of his class in these respects, and as his instinctive democracy was more and more disclosed I marveled while I loved him for it.

During the latter months of the Sixty-seventh Congress I noted that Judge TYSON was in failing health, but in response to solicitude he made but little complaint. I last saw him alive a few days after the close of the session. He remarked that he was about to go to a hospital for examination and treatment. I had no thought of the seriousness of his condition and apparently he did not realize it. When next I heard of him he was dead.

His dead body lay in state in the supreme court chamber in the capitol at Montgomery. The bier was heaped with flowers from a multitude of sorrowing friends, and hundreds came for a last look at the face of the friend and public servant whom they had loved, honored, and admired.

If I were called upon to name the predominant quality which adorned the life of our departed friend, I should without hesitation say "courage." His was, indeed, a courage of the highest order, a courage both physical and moral. He dared to live his life. He dared to think. He dared to be a man. He was not afraid to live. I know that he was not afraid to die. Peace to his ashes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I present the petition of Frank B. Safford, of Havre, Mont., and numerous other homesteaders on the abandoned Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation in the State of Montana. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, without the names, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, as follows:

Petition for relief of the homesteaders on the abandoned Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation, Mont.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Whereas we, the undersigned homesteaders on the abandoned Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation, Mont., by reason of drought of extraordinary duration and severity—hail, grasshoppers, insect pests, and depreciation of farm commodities, agricultural paralysis, and financial depression—finding it impossible, except through grievous hardship, to comply with the provisions for payments for those said lands, as provided under the acts of February 11, 1915, September 7, 1916, and December 29, 1916:

Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, respectfully petition your honorable bodies as follows: That all entrymen upon these lands shall be relieved of further payments under said acts, and where payments have been made in whole or in part pursuant to said acts the same shall be refunded to those who have perfected their entries.

Mr. FRAZIER presented the petition of Dan Radke and 39 other citizens of Cathay, N. Dak., praying an appropriation for the purchase of food supplies for the famine-stricken people in Germany, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented a resolution of the Common Council of the City of Troy, N. Y., protesting against the passage of the so-called McNary-Haugen export corporation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

RESOLUTION OF SOUTH CAROLINA DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

Mr. DIAL. I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations a resolution passed by the South Carolina Democratic convention some days ago.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution for the holding of a commercial world's congress at Washington, by J. S. Wannamaker, St. Matthews, S. C.

Whereas it is universally admitted that general depression in agriculture, trade, and commerce are everywhere apparent; that the disturbed and depressed condition of industry at home and abroad are known of all men; that the usual methods of diplomatic intercourse have proven entirely impotent to restore industrial peace to the world and render normal the regular commercial relations of the nations of the earth; that a longer continuance of the interruption and disturbance of our trade relations with foreign markets will inevitably greatly accentuate the evils from which we now suffer; that prosperity will not return to our fields, our factories, and our mines until confidence is restored and real peace is established; that commercial intercourse, conducted to mutual advantage under equitable and stabilized conditions, is the most powerful of human incentives to personal and public peace among men; that business can best be done in a business way and by business men dealing one with the other in the regular, straightforward, and well-recognized methods known to themselves; that men are everywhere becoming restive, dissatisfied, and rebellious because of the restraints thus unnecessarily imposed upon their industrial energies, and because of the privations and sufferings they are called upon to endure because of these restraints; that methods more specific, simple, and direct of correcting the evils of which complaint is made and which are universally admitted to exist in menacing measure, may and should be restored by going outside of ordinary diplomatic usage: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Democratic Party of South Carolina, in convention assembled, places itself upon record as demanding that a commercial congress of all nations be assembled at Washington to devise ways and means for bringing peace, prosperity, and stability to the agriculture, trade, and commerce of this and other nations; that the Democratic Party pledges itself to such a course; and that a plank to that effect be suitably drawn and incorporated in the platform of the National Democratic Convention to be held in the city of New York on the 24th day of June, 1924.

CENTENNIAL OF LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF FLORIDA

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Commerce Committee resolutions adopted by the Tallahassee (Fla.) Chamber of Commerce and the Florida Press Association with respect to providing a suitable celebration in November, 1924, of the centennial of the first meeting of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALLAHASSEE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Tallahassee, Fla.

Whereas the people of Tallahassee, in cooperation with their fellow citizens in all parts of Florida, are planning a suitable celebration in November, 1924, of the centennial of the first meeting in this city of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida; and

Whereas it is deemed appropriate and desirable that the United States Government should give official recognition of this auspicious anniversary: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives from Florida be requested to secure the passage of a congressional resolution authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commissioner to represent the Government of the United States at such celebration in the city of Tallahassee and elsewhere in this State and to cooperate in such other manner as the President may deem proper, no appropriation of funds by the United States Government being contemplated in this request for Federal recognition of the proposed centennial celebration.

Resolutions adopted by the Florida Press Association at its meeting held in Cocoa, April, 1924

Whereas in November, 1823, the First Legislative Council of the State of Florida met in Tallahassee; and

Whereas the one hundredth anniversary of the meeting of this legislative council marked the beginning of what is now the fastest-growing State of the Union; and

Whereas the citizens of Tallahassee, by its chamber of commerce and civic clubs, are making preparations to properly celebrate the centenary of this important event: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Florida Press Association, in annual meeting assembled, That all the newspapers of the State be urged to throw their columns open to centennial suggestions from their readers, so that in each county or important city rapid progress can be made in arranging for a proper commemoration.

2. Resolved, That the Florida Press Association will do all in its power to give publicity to the proper celebration in Tallahassee of the one hundredth anniversary of the first session of the first legislative council of this State in that city.

3. Resolved, That through the newspapers each city and town be called upon to impress upon those in educational positions, the churches, etc., the importance of forming centennial committees at once, so as to give the children an understanding of the significance of the century just ended, and the fact that upon their shoulders will rest the affairs of the State of Florida during the second century.

4. Resolved, That Gov. Cary A. Hardee be requested to issue a proclamation that will adequately sum up the history of a century's progress as a means of stimulating the people of Florida to do honor to the founders and guides of the State, to the accomplishments of the century, and to pledge the State to the greater Florida that is destined to arise upon the foundation work already done.

5. Resolved, That the State superintendent of public instruction, Hon. W. S. Cawthon, be requested to arrange a program for use in all the public schools of the State to the end that the date agreed on as the proper one may be set apart and celebrated in all institutions of learning all over Florida.

———, President Florida Press Association.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS RECOMMITTED

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. President, by mistake on Saturday I reported from the Committee on Claims the bill (S. 927) for the relief of the widow and minor children of Raymond C. Hanford and the bill (S. 3115) for the relief of Rosa B. Smolik. I move that the bills be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITION TO HARRINGTON HOTEL

Mr. EDWARDS. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3269) to amend an act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia, approved June 1, 1910, and I submit a report (No. 619) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if there is a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. EDWARDS. There is. The bill applies to only one building in the city of Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of it, but I hope it will not be regarded as a precedent by the commissioners or by the people of the District to authorize the construction of buildings of this height. I think we ought to restrict the height of buildings to 70 feet, and certainly not to exceed 90 feet. We are going to destroy the harmony of the city in any architectural beauty the city may finally attain if we permit the erection of buildings at varying heights and to such extreme heights as is proposed.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BALL. The object of this bill is to prevent precisely what the Senator from Utah has stated he objects to. It permits the erection of an addition to the building at the same height as the building itself.

Mr. KING. I am familiar with that.

Mr. BALL. That is all the bill proposes to do.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, for information, I should like to know the name of the hotel to which the proposed addition is to be made.

Mr. BALL. The name of the hotel, I think, is the Hotel Harrington.

Mr. EDWARDS. It is the Harrington Hotel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey for the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to regulate the height of buildings in the District of Columbia," approved June 1, 1910, be, and it is hereby, amended by adding at the end of paragraph 5 of said act the following proviso:

"And provided further, That a building be permitted to be erected to a height not to exceed 130 feet on lots 15, 804, and 805, square 322, located on the southeast corner of Twelfth and E Streets NW., said building to conform in height and to be used as an addition to the hotel building located to the east thereof on lot 18, square 322."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 3389) granting an increase of pension to Christiana L. Chick (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. STERLING. I desire to call attention to the bill (S. 3251) for the relief of Elizabeth W. Kieffer, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. Similar bills have heretofore been referred to the Committee on Claims. I therefore move that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. KING submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,500,000 for continued investigations, continuation of construction, and incidental operations at the Strawberry Valley project, Utah, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE INSPECTORS

Mr. DILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1898) to readjust the compensation of postmasters and reclassify and readjust the salaries and compensation of employees in the Postal Service, which was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 15, at the end of line 11, insert the following:

"And provided that post-office inspectors shall not be eligible for transfer or appointment to any executive or supervisory position in the Postal Service other than in the inspection division and within two years after they have ceased to be inspectors.

CONDITIONS IN RUSSIA (S. DOC. 121)

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the speech of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] with regard to Russia, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD beginning on page 7018 of the RECORD of Saturday, May 24, 1924, may be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it so ordered.

S. 105. An act for the relief of Arthur Frost; and

S. 2922. An act to authorize the President to reconsider the case of Frederic K. Long and to reappoint him a captain in the Regular Army.

HOWARD UNIVERSITY ATHLETIC FIELD AND GYMNASIUM

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

Mr. BALL. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2694) to enable the trustees of Howard University to develop an athletic field and gymnasium project, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. BALL. I should like briefly to explain just what the bill proposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let us have the bill read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, on page 2, after line 20, to insert:

SEC. 6. Provided further, That an easement in the areas of the streets hereby closed shall remain in the District of Columbia for all except highway purposes, and that no structures shall be erected thereon except with the permission of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That those portions of Fairmont and Girard Streets lying within the area to be acquired and between the said area and the present grounds of Howard University, together with all alley space not subject to the terms of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, shall and are hereby declared to be closed and abandoned as public ways and shall be subject to acquisition under section 1 hereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the bill is so long and involves so many pieces of property that I can not follow its reading from the desk nor can I understand it from the report which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] has filed with the bill. I will ask the Senator from Delaware is there any direct appropriation involved in the bill?

Mr. BALL. A considerable appropriation, amounting to eight hundred and some odd thousand dollars, has been in an appropriation bill which has heretofore passed. The extension of the grounds of Howard University for athletic fields and for buildings is held up until they can at least have an alley closed. The bill also provides for the university purchasing some additional land, but Congress is called on to make no appropriation. The expense will be paid by gifts or other funds secured by the university. The bill will permit them to go ahead with their project for an athletic field and to use the appropriation which Congress has already made to the university.

Mr. SMOOT. When did Congress make an appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. BALL. The appropriation was carried in the first appropriation bill which was passed at this session of Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. That proposed appropriation for over $800,000 was put in the bill by the Senate, but it went out in conference.

Mr. BALL. The appropriation was made for this purpose in House bill 3078.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BALL. In the bill making appropriations for the Department of the Interior $812,000 was appropriated for Howard University.

Mr. OVERMAN. But, I repeat, that that item went out in conference between the two Houses.

Mr. SMOOT. The appropriation to which the Senator from Delaware refers was not made but was stricken out in conference. The two items were offered as amendments on the floor of the Senate, and a special rule was brought in in order to keep them in the bill, but the House conferees would not yield their opposition to the two items which were involved, and therefore the conferees on the part of the Senate had to recede.

Mr. BALL. Then the university authorities have themselves raised the funds for this purpose from other sources and are ready to proceed with their building.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is not what the bill provides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request which has been made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL].

Mr. SMOOT. Until we may know more about the bill, I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I had intended to ask for the consideration of a bill on the calendar, but the Senator from Utah thinks we had better commence at the beginning of the calendar, and I will accede to his suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD PROPAGANDA

The resolution (S. Res. 124) directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to secure information relative to amount of money expended for the purpose of creating public interest favorable to railroad sentiment was announced as next in order.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be necessary, first, to determine whether the resolution is to be considered by the Senate. The Secretary will state the resolution.

The READING CLERK. The committee proposes to strike out all after the resolving clause and in lieu thereof to insert an amendment in the nature of a substitute, to which amendment the Senator from Idaho offers an amendment, on page 4, line 15, after the word "within," to strike out "60 days" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seven months."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. KING. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. The committee proposes to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to investigate, along such lines and with such detail as to reveal clearly and accurately the amounts expended for propaganda, as defined in this resolution, during the calendar year 1923, by each common carrier by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, subject to the interstate commerce act, as amended, and designated by the commission as a Class I carrier. The term "propaganda" means (a) the preparation, publication, or distribution of advertising matter, magazines, books, pamphlets, newspaper articles and editorials, or other forms of literature, the engaging of speakers, or other forms of publicity, oral, written, or printed; (b) the payment of compensation, or travel, subsistence, or other expenses, in connection with services rendered by any person; (c) the making of contributions to any association, bureau, institute, committee, chamber of commerce, or similar organization; or (d) any other method of propaganda, if such publicity, service, contribution, or other method of propaganda is designed—

(1) To mold public sentiment so as to be favorable to the railroads or with regard to any State or Federal legislative matter;

(2) To influence acts or decisions of any legislative administrative, of judicial officer or agency, whether State or Federal, or of any member, officer, or employee of any such agency; or

(3) To secure the election, appointment, or removal of public officers or employees or the creation or abolishment of public agencies, whether State or Federal.

In its investigation the commission—

(a) Shall require of each carrier subject to this resolution a special report, under oath, in such detail as the commission may specify, stating the amounts of the expenditures required to be investigated by the commission under this resolution and the accounts to which such expenditures were charged.

(b) Shall, to such extent as it deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution, obtain information by field investigation, and by requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents.

(c) May avail itself of any other powers vested in it by law.

The commission is further directed to transmit its report to the Senate within 60 days after adoption of this resolution.

For the purposes of this resolution an amount shall be deemed expended by a carrier if expended by it directly or through an officer, employee, or agent of the carrier, or through a corporation affiliated with it, or through any other agency.

Any report by a carrier under this resolution of a contribution to an association, bureau, institute, committee, chamber of commerce, or other organization shall include the name and address of the organization and the purpose for which the contribution was made.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce is directed, either as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the extent, character, methods, and purposes of propaganda emanating directly or indirectly from common carriers by railroad, or from associations, bureaus, institutes, committees, chambers of commerce, or similar organizations receiving contributions or dues, fees, assessments, or other payments from such carriers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I send to the desk a short letter, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

THE STATE OF UTAH,
PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION,
Salt Lake City, April 1, 1924.

Hon. F. R. GOODING,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR GOODING: I was very much pleased to receive your letter March 19 indicating favorable progress for your bill regulating long-and-short-haul rates of the carriers.

The situation in the intermountain States is being made exceedingly difficult for those supporting the bill for the reason that the carriers are very busy among commercial clubs and are advertising in daily papers with the object of convincing the public that no legislation of any kind bearing upon the railroad question should be passed at this session of Congress.

Recently the carriers have prevailed upon some of the commercial clubs in this section to send "official observers" to Washington to complete their education upon matters affecting the carriers. These gentlemen apparently have not as yet received their diplomas, for they have not thus far told the public of the wisdom they have acquired.

I recently had the pleasure of appearing before a committee of the Salt Lake Commercial Club and succeeded in getting them to rescind action which they had previously taken supporting the contention that the transportation act be not amended. I understand since some other committee of the club, before whom I was not invited to appear, took some sort of action which resulted, as I have heretofore indicated, in sending a student to Washington.

If there is anything I can do, or data that I can furnish, do not hesitate to call upon me.

With best wishes,

Very truly yours,

WARREN STROUTNOR, Commissioner.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I am sure the Senators all understand the propaganda by the railroads that is saturating the whole country at the present time. All of this expense is charged up to the operating expense of the railroads. The people pay the bill; and I am quite sure that the people and Congress are entitled to know how this money is spent, and what agencies are created for the purpose of influencing legislation.

In my State, all at once, the railroads are advertising in every little local newspaper that there is in the State of Idaho. They are controlling many of our commercial clubs by sending out special agents to wait upon them. Men are employed in different lines of activity for the influence they may have, not only in the State but nationally, in legislation; and as long as the people are taxed for it in freight rates it seems to me it is time that the Interstate Commerce Commission should make this investigation so that we may know just how far the railroads are going, because under the Esch-Cummins Act they can spend as much as they please for any purpose, and it is all charged up to operating expenses.

Something like $7,000,000 is spent at the present time, which the railroads report, in advertising. During the time that the tax bill was up the Pennsylvania Railroad on their menu cards were advertising the Mellon tax plan, and urged everybody, of course, to support the Mellon tax plan. They go beyond the legitimate business of railroads, all of which the people must pay in freight rates.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Have any estimates been made of the cost to the railroads of furnishing the information that is asked for in this resolution?

Mr. GOODING. It should not be very great. That matter was taken up. It will be done largely, as I understand, through questionnaires and field work where necessary. They must have a record of it all. There should not be any great expense to the railroads, it seems to me.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Have not some estimates been made by the commission as to what it would cost the railroads to go through all their accounts and report on this matter?

Mr. GOODING. I think not.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I was told that it would cost approximately half a million dollars for all the railroads to make this report.

Mr. GOODING. Regardless of the expense, it seems to me that if the railroads are going to tax the people to mold public opinion it is very dangerous to the best interests of the Government, and the people have a right to know how much they expend and how far they go.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; but we make them report at a cost to them of half a million dollars, and that is added to the rates that they charge the people for the service they render.

Mr. GOODING. I think this will eliminate a lot of expense after we find out what channels they are spending the money in, and save the railroads a great many millions of dollars.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Suppose the Senator were in charge of the Pennsylvania Railroad, does he not think it would take him a good deal of time to calculate what it costs to print advertisements on the backs of menus, instead of printing statistics about ham and eggs?

Mr. GOODING. I think it was an improper place for such an advertisement, and I do not think the people should be expected to pay for such advertising, although that is what they do. I think the matter of time and expense is a minor matter compared with the importance of this legislation to the people and to the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOODING. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question right along the lines of the question asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania about the time it is going to take to do this. Does not the Senator think that if the railroads would temporarily call off the men who are engaged in the propaganda and put them at work to find out how much it has cost up to date in this year the railroads probably would not be put to any extra expense at all, although it might interfere with the propaganda that is going on?

Mr. GOODING. That is the only thing it would stop; and I do not think it would take half the men they have employed in that kind of work to get the information, without any expense.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. It seems to me that while there is unquestionably a laudable purpose in one angle of this resolution, yet it is very apt——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Idaho under the rule has expired. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized in his own right.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, in my own time I started to call attention to the fact that it seems to me the advertising referred to in the resolution is very apt to overlap a perfectly legitimate type of advertising in which railroads and transportation companies do indulge, and in my judgment should indulge. In other words, the railroads are big business enterprises. They run all kinds of tours. They run to all the resorts of the country. They advertise not only resort facilities, but agricultural facilities through the sections they cover, and undoubtedly they are spending in the newspapers of the land millions of dollars which the newspapers are very glad to have them spend, and which is entirely legitimate from the standpoint of popularizing their service. If this resolution would in a way discourage that perfectly legitimate enterprise it seems to me it would be rather unfortunate.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. There is no thought of curtailing legitimate advertising. I feel that that should be encouraged. We all agree to that. That is not the intention of the resolution at all. It will not curtail anything, but it will give the commission and Congress information as to how much was spent and along what lines it was expended.

Mr. EDGE. It may not be the intention, but a reading of the title of the resolution itself indicates very plainly that such an investigation must include expenditures to create favorable public sentiment. Of course every line they put in a newspaper or a magazine is to create favorable public sentiment, to induce the public to use their lines, to lead people to settle in their sections, and naturally to patronize their system, just the same as the owner of a grocery store would advertise to get people to patronize his store. It seems to me this is a pretty dangerous attempt at demarcation.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I am quite strongly in favor of this resolution. I have had occasion to know something about this propaganda class of advertising in which the railroads indulge. I think the president of about every railroad that runs through Iowa has come out in his private car at big expense to make speeches against me, and put out his propaganda to the different commercial clubs in my State.

This morning I received a letter which shows that the railroads, utilities, and Wall Street brokers have just paid the Cedar Rapids Republican $5,000 for four pages of political advertising against me in the primary that occurs a week from to-day. I should like to have this investigation made, and find out which railroads paid it. If they are paying all of the papers at that rate, there will be a considerable sum spent out in that State for propaganda to defeat me in the primary.

I have seen my name mentioned, too, in some of these menu-card advertisements. The particular grievance the railroads have against me is in reference to this $12,000,000,000 valuation that I have figured out; and the Wall Street Journal, in a recent issue, gave me a full column of editorial attention, but did not dispute the $12,000,000,000 conclusion.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Does not the Senator believe in the old Barnum policy, that it does not make any difference what they say about you; so long as they say something about you, it is good advertising?

Mr. BROOKHART. It is not put out for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, Barnum paid for his own advertising; did he not?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; Barnum paid his own bill.

Mr. EDGE. Then the Senator from Iowa should be all the more pleased, if somebody else is paying for his advertising.

Mr. BROOKHART. Unfortunately, my friends and I are paying the cost of the advertising that is done against me, and it is not quite a square deal. I ought to have something to say about what goes in the advertisements; but I have nothing whatever to say. It is cooked up by a Wall Street broker by the name of Winthrop; I believe he is the commanding general in charge of this campaign at the present time; and I want the people of my State and of all the States to know that there is a gang of financial pirates down here in New York at the headquarters of the railroads that is trying to control the elections and the primaries and the conventions everywhere in this country. They succeed quite often in doing it, too, because the people do not know the origin of this propaganda, and at the same time, through the rates charged by the railroads, they are collecting the pay for these advertisements from the very people they want to deceive.

Therefore I am for this resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me there is nothing unfair about letting the people know how much is being spent for propaganda purposes, especially where the people themselves have to pay the bill.

I put into the RECORD a week or so ago, in discussing this question, letters from representatives of different railroads, sent, for instance, to all their local attorneys and to all their local surgeons, calling upon them to go out and get business men, and particularly farmers, to write letters to their Congressmen asking them to vote against any change in the Esch-Cummins law. We have received thousands and hundreds of thousands of letters as a result of that propaganda that has been going on all over the United States. I could fill the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with them from my own office alone.

Whether it is right or whether it is wrong, to my mind is not so material as the fact that the people who wear clothes and eat food, all the people of the United States, are paying that bill. They are paying that expense when they pay their freight, which they must do, on everything they use and everything they wear and everything they eat.

So it is their money that is being used in this case. It is our money that is being used to fool us. We are paying for our own deception, and the object of this resolution is to find out how much we are being mulcted for the deception being practiced upon us.

Whatever the roads are doing that is legitimate along the line indicated would be disclosed by the investigation which this resolution would require the Interstate Commerce Commission to make, but it seems to me that we have a right to know how much they have spent to have Congress enact the Mellon plan into a law; how much they have spent to prevent any change in the Esch-Cummins law; how much they have spent to prevent the election or bring about the defeat of somebody for public office. This is propaganda which, I submit, Mr. President, it is not fair for the railroads to engage in when they are using the money of the people themselves to do it. We are complaining of high freight rates. Here is one item that goes into the freight rates. An army of expensive men are traveling over the country, I think wrongfully, but whether what they are trying to do is good for the people or not is not involved. They are using our money. We ought to say how and in what manner our money should be used when they are practicing a deception upon us, or carrying out an educational program, if you want to put it that way. In other words, if we are to be influenced by the use of our money, we ought to know how we are being influenced, how much it takes to fool us, how much it takes to educate us and give us some information along this line. That is all this resolution would require, a fair statement of what the railroads are doing with our money.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why confine it to railroads? Why not extend it to all public utilities?

Mr. NORRIS. I would be glad to have it extended to every public utility, but this information is to be gotten by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, as a matter of fact, under the law, does not have jurisdiction over all public utilities. The same reason applies to every public utility, municipal, State, county, or national. As I understand it, this resolution applies to the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate under its authority, and does not attempt to apply any further.

Mr. PITTMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I object to the further consideration of the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now proceed to consider Senate Resolution 124.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am not discussing the ethics of the proposition, but the Senator from Nevada rose and complied with the rule in addressing the Chair, and was recognized. The Senator from Pennsylvania asked the Senator to yield to him, supposedly, of course, for a question. I yielded to the Senator, as I always yield to any Senator. I am not going to discuss the ethics of the action of the Senator——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does the Senator mean——

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a moment; but I do not believe a Senator can be taken off his feet by that kind of a procedure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An objection may be interposed at any stage in the proceedings. The Senator from Nevada yielded to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand, but a Senator can not be taken off his feet by that character of an objection.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator yield again.

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I beg the Senator's pardon for the apparent discourtesy. I understood that it was the practice in the Senate for a Senator to interpose an objection at any time during the consideration of the calendar. I certainly had no intention of taking the Senator off the floor, and I withhold my objection for the present.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this resolution does not confer any additional powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under the transportation act of 1920, the Interstate Commerce Commission are authorized to ascertain the expenses of the railroads. This resolution simply directs them to report to Congress. I do not see any objection to it.

Under the commerce act, by which there is a reasonable and just return assured to the railroads, it is expressly provided that that is to be based upon the operating costs in an economical conduct of the roads. How can the railroads determine what is a fair return upon their property unless they know whether or not there is extravagance in the operating costs?

As I have said, the interstate commerce act of 1920 provides that it is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain whether or not railroads are economically operated, so that they may determine what rate will be required to make a fair return on the property.

This is nothing unusual. The only thing additional in the resolution is that the Interstate Commerce Commission are directed to do what they are authorized to do under another act, and, in addition to that, they are directed to report their findings to the Congress.

There is no doubt but what railroads have a right to advertise. There is no doubt that they have a right to conduct a propaganda which is not legitimate advertising, just as much as anybody else has a right to conduct propaganda. The only proposition is as to what portion of that advertising is legitimate expense. Whatever portion of the advertising is a legitimate expense to be charged against operating costs will be charged into operating costs in determining a fair return on the property. Whatever is not a legitimate advertising cost should be charged to the stockholders of the railroad in the form of deductions from their dividends. That is all there is to the proposition.

There is no use discussing whether railroads have a right to advertise. They have, as any other business institution has; but it is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to find out what is legitimate advertising, so that that may be charged to operating costs, and what is advertising which is not to be included in operating costs. If the stockholders desire to advertise for the purpose of creating public sentiment, there is no law against it, but it is not a part of the essential operating costs, and it should not be charged to operating costs, but it should be deducted from the dividends. It should be deducted from the net profits.

Why should objection be made to the resolution? It does nothing except to carry out the interstate commerce act of 1920. It says to the Interstate Commerce Commission, "You are already authorized to inquire into these expenses. Now, we ask you to proceed with an inquiry and report your findings and recommendations to the Congress."

It seems to me the resolution should be agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I am objecting to this resolution for the same reason that I am objecting to all of these investigations which get nowhere. For years we have been piling up subjects of investigation on the Interstate Commerce Commission and on the Federal Trade Commission, until the quantity of reports reaching Washington each month is measured only by trainloads, and nobody ever reads them. They cost millions of dollars a year to the companies which make those reports, and the expense of preparing them and sending them all goes into the cost of railway service.

We have established an elaborate, complicated system of railway regulation, all to avoid two or three simple crimes which could much better have been avoided by simple penal laws properly enforced. We have a regulatory system that was originated in order to keep rates down, and to-day it is keeping rates up. We all know, if we will admit our honest belief, that railway rates would go down overnight if we would take out from under them the stilts which we have built in this interstate-commerce regulation. We have created a multitude of Federal jobs; we have created an army of Federal investigators; we have immensely complicated the mechanism of government, and the net result of it has been that we are doing exactly what we started out not to do, to keep rates up. What we are doing to-day is preventing the rate reductions that economic causes would bring to pass if we would get rid of this whole machinery, which clutters up this railroad business.

I do not object to everybody knowing what the railroads pay to put the name of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] on their menus. I hope they will put it on in half portions and full portions and keep it on. That is all right. They have a right to do it. They have a right to criticize every one of us, and I hope they will keep on criticizing all of us, because they are American citizens, and any American citizen has the right to say what he thinks of any of us, especially when we are up for reelection.

But, Mr. President, this resolution goes further. What does it ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to do? If Senators will look at page 5 of the resolution, they will see that not only is the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate directed—to investigate the extent, character, methods, and purposes of propaganda emanating directly or indirectly from common carriers by railroad—

But our Committee on Interstate Commerce is also—to investigate the extent, character, methods, and purposes of propaganda emanating * * * from associations, bureaus, institutes, committees, chambers of commerce, or similar organizations receiving contributions or dues, fees, assessments, or other payments from such carriers.

We are asked to charter an investigation into all creation, and when it is all over and done with it will be like the rest of these investigations, it will not have found anything, it will have gotten a few headlines until the people and the newspapers get tired of it, and it will end by spending a lot of public money and doing nobody any good at all.

Therefore, Mr. President, I object to the further consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 124.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would have no objection after 1 o'clock to the Senator making the motion, but under the rule that motion can not be made until after 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the morning business has been closed.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the rule say "morning business or 1 o'clock"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Rule VII, paragraph 3, provides that—

Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the Chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar shall be entertained by the Presiding Officer, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. I asked the Chair if the word "or" is not used.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; it says "or"; but morning business has been closed. Therefore, the motion of the Senator from Idaho is in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the motion is in order, but it is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It must be decided without debate.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 124.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Has the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He is necessarily absent, and I have promised to take care of him with a pair. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McLEAN (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 19, as follows:

So Mr. GOODING's motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 124 was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BROOKHART obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING]. A few moments ago, while the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was addressing the Senate, I interrupted him and asked why not include all public utilities in the amendment. He stated that the reason why they should not be included was the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission had jurisdiction to act only in the case of railroads. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho, who I believe is the author of the amendment to the committee amendment, if he would not be willing to strike out of the resolution all except that part which relates to railroads?

Mr. GOODING. Which particular language would the Senator from North Carolina suggest eliminating?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not examined the resolution very carefully, but the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] read it a few moments ago and it appeared from his reading that the Senator from Idaho has included not only railroads but chambers of commerce and other similar associations. I am asking if he would not be willing to strike out all those things so as to leave the resolution applicable only to political advertising on the part of railroads?

Mr. GOODING. I shall not object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from North Carolina that that will have to be done in the form of an amendment; as the pending question is an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. SMITH and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not had time to examine the resolution carefully, but I shall do so and unless some other Senator offers the amendment in the meantime, I will offer it a little later.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I want to say a few words in reply to the suggestions of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. He announced with a great deal of assurance that we would have lower railroad rates if the management and regulation of the roads were turned back to their private owners. Of course he has entirely ignored the long American history when they had their own way. It was a long time before we gave the Interstate Commerce Commission any power to regulate rates whatever, and after we did try to give it to them, 10 years later the Supreme Court found out we had not done it, so, I believe, it was about 1906 when they first actually had that power. From 1887 up until that time I want to describe something about what happened to railroad rates in my part of the country as a result of that untrammeled control by the railroad managements themselves.

It cost during all of that period 5 cents a hundred extra on first class and 5 per cent over the Chicago rate to cross the Mississippi River into the State of Iowa more than it did to cross the same river a few miles below Keokuk, at Hannibal, Mo., though the distance was almost that much greater down to Hannibal than it was to Keokuk. That discrimination in rates built up under this untrammeled system was almost the ruination of Keokuk. Hugh L. Cooper, who built the Keokuk Dam, which was at that time the greatest water power in all the world, testified in one of our hearings that a manufacturer could better afford to locate in Quincy, Ill., and pay for his power than he could to locate at Keokuk, Iowa, and pay that extra freight and get his power absolutely free. That is how the discrimination was used against the whole State of Iowa, and that continued up until about 1915, when, after a long series of years of fighting, we succeeded in removing the discrimination.

Not only that, but one other illustration of private management of the railroads without any Government regulation is that in the early days the Standard Oil Co. not only succeeded in getting rebates for itself from what it shipped upon the railroads but it succeeded in compelling the railroads to pay to the Standard a part of the freight that was actually collected from its competitors. That is private management without any governmental supervision whatever.

Therefore, when we come to consider the facts and the history of the situation, the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is the usual suggestion of all great capitalists who have organized themselves for the purpose of taking these unlawful and unjust tolls from the rest of the people of the United States.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I do not understand that the resolution has anything to do with the fixing of rates, but it is a resolution designed to control propaganda and publicity. It seems to me that if we are going into the proposition of controlling publicity or propaganda we are entering a pretty wide field.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURSUM. I feel that we ought to be strong enough to resist propaganda. I am in sympathy with the Gooding bill and voted for it. I think it is all right and along proper lines. I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. The situation I have just described was brought about largely by propaganda, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], in his discussion, brought up the matter of accepting that propaganda as true when it was not in fact true in any sense.

Mr. BURSUM. But we as representatives of the people must be sufficiently strong and sufficiently advised to hear both sides of a question and be in a position to discern propaganda from facts.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. BURSUM. This is a free country and one of the great principles upon which the Government was formed is free speech, free publicity. There is such a thing as carrying the matter of control too far.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is exactly the purpose of the resolution, so that we can be advised of the propaganda. We all believe in free speech, but we do not believe in a secret scheme of propaganda that is not free because it is charged up in railroad rates to us when it is put out against us.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BURSUM. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator made the statement that it has not anything to do with rates. All of this expense is included in the freight bill and the passenger rates. There is no question about that. So it does have something to do with rates. It is all in the rates. But the real object is not to stop free speech nor anything like it, but to find out how much of our money is being used to fool us. That is all the resolution proposes to do. The propaganda is carried on with money that is added to the expense of the railroads, of which those who live anywhere within 1,000 miles of the railroads have to pay their proportionate share. It not only goes into the rates, but we pay for it. All the resolution does is to give publicity. It is to disclose the true state of facts and not to suppress anything.

Mr. BURSUM. I have never found it difficult to identify propaganda.

Mr. NORRIS. But if the Senator had a propaganda directed at him and had to pay for the matter, would he not like to find out how much it cost to fool him?

Mr. BURSUM. We pay for all the cost of propaganda; it is part of the cost of living. Propaganda is carried on through the daily press, through the weekly press, and by almost every kind of organization, official, unofficial, or semiofficial. It is a part of the American life, and I think it would hardly be fair to undertake to put the brakes on one concern unless we put them on all classes of industry and all classes of interests which might seek to influence legislation.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. BURSUM. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Is it not true that the expenditure for some of this so-called propaganda may, and undoubtedly does—and that is the object of it—increase the business of the railroads and thus lower rates? General advertising, general propaganda, is not carried on for the purpose of adding to expense; the expenditure is made for the purpose of increasing business and thus increasing profits.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the usual result is to increase profits and not to lower rates.

Mr. EDGE. But there must be an increase of profits before rates may be lowered. We have not yet gotten on a socialistic basis.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico pardon an interruption?

Mr. BURSUM. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The resolution defines the kind of propaganda at which it is aimed. Plainly it is not propaganda of the character about which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has just spoken. If the Senator from New Mexico will permit me, I should like to read the propaganda to which the resolution applies and which is defined in the resolution itself.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. However, of course, I can point that out in my own time.

Mr. BURSUM. I appreciate that the resolution is designed to control propaganda relating to railroad matters, railroad policies, railroad legislation, and things of that kind.

Mr. SIMMONS. It includes legislation?

Mr. BURSUM. Certainly; but when we go into such a field, if we are going to be fair, we ought to pursue the same policy with reference to all kinds of industries and all kinds of interests which are constantly advocating various measures through propaganda and otherwise by a multitude of associations all over the country. It seems to me that we ought to be strong enough to resist any kind of publicity. I am willing to give the other fellow a chance; I am willing to let him show his case as best he can in any legitimate way that he can. Then, if I am not sufficiently strong to judge the true facts and the true situation, I would say that I was not competent to hold the position which I now occupy.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico pardon an interruption?

Mr. BURSUM. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. There would be no disagreement between the Senator and myself as to the right of any corporation or any agency to indulge in any propaganda that is legitimate and proper, provided the expense of that propaganda is to be paid out of the pocketbook of the corporation or the agency and not to be paid by the taxpayers—the farmers and business people of the country. That is the very gravamen of this resolution, as I understand it. This remedy is proposed because the expense of this political advertisement in this instance is paid by the people. Now, it is perfectly legitimate that the people should pay the reasonable expense of advertising for the purpose of promoting the business of a corporation and facilitating the business of the people who resort to that corporation for the purpose of distributing their products; but——

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, this propaganda is here defined, and I should like very much if the Senator would permit me to read the definition, for I think it will probably help him in the discussion of the matter.

Mr. BURSUM. I think I understand the purpose, and I fully appreciate the statement of the Senator that the cost is a burden laid upon the people; but in that respect it is not unlike any kind of propaganda or any kind of publicity, all of which is added to the general cost of living in this country. It is a part of American life, and, in my opinion, the general public believes in giving free and ample opportunity to hear all sides of a question. It would be hard to segregate inadvisable publicity and that which the Senator will admit is now carried on for the welfare of the country with no selfish purpose; it would be hard to segregate the kind of publicity that we would admit and the kind that we would not admit.

For my part, I am willing that railroads or industrial plants or any institution—a factory, a stock grower, a woolgrower, a farmer, or any element of industry—should come to Congress with their representations in such manner as they deem proper and present their case. Let us hear all sides of every question.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, there can not possibly be any difficulty in properly segregating that class of propaganda which is perfectly legitimate for railroads to indulge in and that class of propaganda which it is not legitimate for them to indulge in; and this resolution attempts to do that very thing.

Mr. BURSUM. But would the Senator deny free speech? Would he deny any element of industry the right to present its claims?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no purpose to deny free speech, but the purpose is if the railroads wish to express themselves with regard to legislation, if they wish to express themselves with a view to influencing the decisions of courts, they should do it out of their own money and not out of the people's money.

Mr. BURSUM. Yes; but in order to investigate all these things the chances are that it will cost more than the cost involved in the advertising itself. It seems to me that we are going too far in this matter, at least, and therefore I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. SMITH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. BURSUM. I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the question, but I do desire, if the Senator from South Carolina will pardon me just a moment, to put into the RECORD in connection with the speech the Senator from New Mexico has just delivered and the interruptions that I made during its delivery exactly the kind of propaganda at which the resolution is aimed and to which it is confined. I think that will clarify the discussion very much, because I assume that many Senators, like myself, had not read the resolution until they came into the Chamber this morning. I did not read it until the Senator from Idaho made the motion to take it up. I quote from the resolution:

That the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to investigate, along such lines and with such detail as to reveal clearly and accurately, the amounts expended for propaganda, as defined in this resolution—

I quote further—

The term "propaganda" means (a) the preparation, publication, or distribution of advertising matter, magazines, books, pamphlets, newspaper articles and editorials, or other forms of literature, the engaging of speakers, or other forms of publicity, oral, written, or printed; (b) the payment of compensation, or travel, subsistence, or other expenses, in connection with services rendered by any person; (c) the making of contributions—

Referring, of course, to contributions by the railroads—to any association, bureau, institute, committee, chamber of commerce, or similar organization; or (d) any other method of propaganda, if such publicity, service, contribution, or other method of propaganda is designed—

(1) To mold public sentiment so as to be favorable to the railroads—

Not for the purpose of securing business for the railroads, but "to mold public sentiment so as to be favorable to the railroads"— or with regard to any State or Federal legislative matter;

(2) To influence acts or decisions of any legislative, administrative, or judicial officer or agency, whether State or Federal, or of any member, officer, or employee of any such agency; or

(3) To secure the election, appointment, or removal of public officers or employees or the creation or abolishment of public agencies, whether State or Federal.

Those are the questions to which the propaganda must be directed in order to come within the inhibition of this resolution. What Senator is there in the Chamber who will say that it is legitimate for a railroad to spend money which it collects through freight charges and passenger charges, and which, therefore, is paid by the public, with a view to securing legislation favorable to the railroad, with a view to influencing the decisions of the courts in favor of the railroad, with a view to influencing the action of the officials charged with the administration of the law, even the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, or with a view to influencing the election, appointment, or removal of public officers? It seems to me, Mr. President, that it can not be said that it is legitimate for the railroads to tax the people for that purpose and to be allowed such expenditures in connection with ascertaining what they may under the present law charge and what they may not charge or what amount of net income they may receive or they may not receive without deduction.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield the floor to the Senator. I have said all I wish to say.

Mr. COPELAND. I merely wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question. Let me call his attention to line 16. Ought not the language to read, beginning in line 15?—

To mold public sentiment so as to be favorable to the railroads with regard to any State or Federal legislative matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the conjunction "or" ought to be stricken out. I think the Senator's criticism is absolutely correct.

Mr COPELAND. I think so, because there certainly will be a misapprehension of the sentiment of the resolution if the word "or" shall not be stricken out, because it would do away with the privilege of the railroads to advertise their lines and their advantages. It would seem to me that the conjunction "or," therefore, ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I stated a little while ago that unless some other Senator should do so I would offer an amendment to strike out the provision with reference to chambers of commerce, and so on. The Senator from South Carolina, as I understand, has prepared an amendment to that effect, and, therefore, I shall not offer it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before beginning the remarks I have to make on this resolution, I move to strike out the last paragraph, beginning on page 5, line 1, down to the end. That includes chambers of commerce.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from South Carolina that there is now pending an amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. SMITH. Before the vote is taken on that amendment, then, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under the new transportation act we have departed entirely and very radically from the old order of rate making. It is not necessary for me to go into the particulars of the divergence from the old order. It is sufficient for me to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission are instructed to take the railroad property as a whole, or in such groups as they may in their judgment think necessary for rate-making purposes, and lay such a tax in the way of rates and fares as in their judgment may most nearly effect a return to the roads up to a point that they themselves determine is a fair return.

In the present instance they have decided that 5½ per cent upon the property devoted to public use would be a fair return. The provisions of the transportation act require as precedent to this fair return that the roads shall be economically and efficiently administered. Upon inquiry by the committee, it was disclosed that the Interstate Commerce Commission is practically without working means of ascertaining whether or not the roads are economically administered. As a matter of course, the expenditures of these roads all enter into the account and must be provided for before the net amount of 5½ per cent is apportioned. Therefore, the matter of advertising—propaganda looking toward affecting the things set forth in this bill—becomes a charge that enters into the tax upon the people.

This resolution simply directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to do what it has under the present law the power to do but has not been specifically directed by Congress to do; namely, to ascertain what are the factors that enter into an economic administration of the railroad property.

As soon as the amendment offered by the author of the resolution [Mr. GOODING] shall have been disposed of I am going to move to strike out the last paragraph, which does not pertain per se to the railroads' advertising propaganda.

I shall not attempt to reflect on the wisdom or the common sense of this body by indicating that we have a right to know whether or not a public utility which by law has a monopoly of the transportation business in this country so far as rail carriage is concerned is flooding the country with propaganda, with advertising, with speakers if necessary, and charging it to the public, and letting it be reflected in the rates that we have to pay.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has very clearly defined what is the purpose and object of the resolution, and how legitimate and necessary it is. I do not think we ought to go into extraneous matter, and burden the commission with the investigation of things that are merely intangible and indirect.

Mr. President, in reporting out this resolution the committee did not attach any more importance to it than it proposes to attach to another proposition that will be brought before this body at the first opportunity; namely, that the commission shall be given ample means and clothed with the necessary power to investigate and report to this body the expenditures of the railroads in discharging the duty laid upon them by virtue of the franchises that we give them, in order that the public may be advised as to whether the roads are economically and efficiently administered. As the matter now stands, it is practically a cost-plus proposition. Whatever the costs of the railroads may be, whether wise or unwise, whether efficient or inefficient, they have to be taken entirely ex parte by the commission, or practically so. So, under the new law, if it is to remain the law of the land, it is our duty to see that the expense accounts of the roads shall be checked up, as well as that provision shall be made that they may earn 5½ per cent; and this is but a resolution looking toward having the commission investigate this proposition.

Mr. President, as soon as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] is disposed of, I desire to offer the amendment to which I have already called attention.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of this resolution. It is not so much that the people are opposed to propaganda, but I believe they are entitled to know where the propaganda comes from, and what it costs, and who pays for it. It makes a great deal of difference in our estimation of propaganda if we know who is back of it.

During the past few months I have received a great many resolutions passed by various commercial clubs of the cities of North Dakota. They have been especially opposed, according to these resolutions, to any change in the existing railroad legislation at the present session of Congress. I was rather interested to find out where that propaganda was coming from, and why the commercial clubs, the business men of the towns of North Dakota, should be opposed to amendments to the existing railroad legislation, because they must have realized that the high freight rates were one of the things that were helping to put the farmers out of business in North Dakota.

After some correspondence, one of the members of a commercial club wrote me that the local railroad attorney of the Great Northern Railroad Co. was the one that put through this resolution in his commercial club. That explained the matter; and undoubtedly it was the railroad attorneys of the various towns throughout the State that got these resolutions passed and sent in.

It seems to me that publicity is a mighty good thing, and that we should have more of it. The more I watch and observe the votes of Senators, the more I am convinced that the joint resolution I introduced—Senate Joint Resolution No. 74, introduced some time ago and referred to the Committee on Finance—should be passed by Congress, giving publicity to the standing of every Member of Congress. This particular joint resolution has not been reported out by the Committee on Finance, and up to date we have failed even to get a hearing upon it. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, has opposed the joint resolution by letter, and perhaps that accounts for it; but I believe the joint resolution is a good thing and should be put across.

There is a lot of propaganda coming in on various subjects, especially during the last week or so, propaganda for adjournment of Congress on the 7th of June. It may be easy to tell where this propaganda comes from, and yet in my estimation we must have some legislation for the relief of the agricultural districts before adjournment is taken. It seems to me that if the present administration is going before the public in this campaign on its record it is absolutely necessary to pass some farm relief legislation, such as the Norris-Sinclair bill or the McNary-Haugen bill. I for one am opposed to any adjournment until such legislation is passed, and I am strongly in favor of the resolution that is now pending to give more publicity, more real facts, to the people as to where the propaganda is coming from, and who pays for it, and all the information we can get on this propaganda that is being put out so largely to the people and the Members of Congress at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs upon the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 11, after the word "organization" and before the semicolon, it is proposed to insert a comma and the following words:

> Or the expense of the publication of a newspaper or the contribution of financial support, directly or indirectly, toward the expense for the publication of a newspaper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, on account of the remarks made by some of the Senators it is probable that those who have not read the resolution would have been deceived as to its purport unless that erroneous idea had been corrected by Senators who have preceded me in discussing this question. I desire to reiterate and make it plain that this resolution does not deal with the question of legitimate and proper publicity on the part of a railroad in connection with its legitimate operation. That is made very plain in the definition clause of the resolution, which clause defines the character of propaganda to which the investigation is directed—propaganda intended to influence legislative action, the decision of courts, and the conduct of other public officials.

In my opinion the measure in its present form does not reach another kind of propaganda which is carried on by some railroad companies; that is, the ownership of newspapers or contribution to the support of newspapers. In some sections railroads have acquired the ownership of newspapers and had the stocks held by some one else, and those newspapers have been nothing in the world except the mouthpieces of the corporate interests and the railroad interests of the country.

I believe that we should allow freedom of speech. We want freedom of speech, but what we desire is to let the public know the methods employed in the expression of opinion on the part of those who are circulating propaganda and trying to have an influence on public opinion or upon the opinion of officers dealing with legislative or with other problems.

That is the reason I proposed this amendment. I believe in being perfectly fair with the railroad interests of the country. I realize that when their interests are attacked they should have the right to represent their interests in a legitimate, proper way and to expend reasonable sums of money for that purpose. I do not think it would be right to say that they have no right to place their side of a case before the public, and I would not take from them that right. But the object of this legislation is to ascertain their practice in regard to improper propaganda, the deceptive kind, the using of funds exacted from the public in divers ways to try to bring before the public certain positions and certain contentions made on their part, and at the same time not let the public know of the authenticity of the particular publication or information which they are giving to the public. That is where the harm comes. Of course, they have no right to exact revenue, as the railroads can of the public, in the nature of freight rates and other expenses that are imposed upon the public, to carry on this kind of maneuvering.

Some newspapers are published just as though they were owned by private ownership and supported by private funds, when, as a matter of fact, they are owned or maintained by railroads or by their stockholders for the purpose of molding public opinion. Yet they give publicity to all kinds of supposed news and information affecting the action of Congress and of other governmental activities. They frequently publish statements which mislead the public.

Allowing the railroads to maintain newspapers and support them financially affects the other newspapers of the country and frequently interferes to quite an extent with the legitimate press, the press that is supported by private capital and private individuals, which has to stand upon its own merits and maintain itself upon its own industry.

They have a barrel of money to support newspapers they own or control. They do not care whether they make or lose money. It is just merely a matter of influencing public opinion on questions affecting railroad interests and questions affecting other large corporate interests. I have found that this character of newspaper is usually in sympathy in every respect with the big interests of the country.

Of course, I do not mean the railroads own newspapers scattered all around over the country, but they own a sufficient number of the large dailies, or contribute to the expenses or maintenance and support of those papers, to give them quite an influence in molding public opinion. Publishing of newspapers by a railroad does not come within the legitimate operation of railroads and should not be permitted.

It has been suggested by Senators that of course the people ought to be able to take care of the situation regardless of what might be published. That is all right, but people want to know the source of the ownership, they want to know who is speaking when they see in one of these newspapers certain utterances, and when they fail to see certain public information which may have a bearing upon the subject because the railroad-owned newspapers have suppressed that information.

I offer the amendment with no antagonism whatever toward railroads carrying on their legitimate publicity. I think they ought to be allowed to do that. I offer it with no antagonism toward railroads presenting in a proper way their side of the case on public questions. They have a right to do that, and this right should not be interfered with. I offer the amendment because I desire to have the public know if railroads are expending money for the purpose of maintaining newspapers and giving out information to the public as though it were coming from some disinterested source.

I hope the amendment I have offered to the amendment will be agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6715) to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

TRADE IN COTTON

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I had permission a while ago to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a resolution passed by the Democratic convention in my State last week looking to the calling of a world economic conference with a view to opening up the markets of the world and extending our trade, particularly trade in agricultural products. I want to commend that thought to the Senate.

I have always been interested in the proposition, and I am glad to state that last fall a delegation came to Washington from Russia, headed by Mr. Victor P. Nogin, representing the All-Russian Textile Syndicate.

The object of that delegation was to purchase cotton. They got into communication with some of us, and we sent them down South. Russia had not been in the market for purchasing our cotton, at least directly, for several years. I watched the development of the negotiations of that commission with great interest.

They stated to me that they wanted a large quantity of cotton and at first I was a little bit doubtful as to the result of their efforts; but I thought they were working along the right line, and I introduced them to the Cooperative Marketing Association of the South.

I am glad to state that up to this time they have purchased directly in the United States 120,000 bales of cotton and shipped it to Russia. Also, at this moment they are loading another shipment of 20,000 bales at New Orleans and are loading two shipments at Savannah, Ga., one of 8,000 and one of 8,500 bales, and they are in the market for considerably more of our cotton. I look upon that as a splendid outlet for our produce, and I hope that trade will continue to grow.

I was sorry to hear on last Saturday that Mr. Nogin, the head of this delegation which came to the United States, had died suddenly. He was a man of very great influence in Russia, a man of splendid personality, a charming individual. I look upon his death as a great loss to our agriculture.

We want to open up other markets of this kind, and I have a bill pending now—the Alien Property Custodian bill—which I hope to have taken up this afternoon and passed. It will encourage our people very much and it will encourage the people of Germany, Austria, and Hungary to buy our raw agricultural products.

By passing that bill we would enable the Germans, who have the mills and who have the labor and who have the demand for the goods, to convert their labor into cash. That is true also of the people of Austria and Hungary. There is great demand for our raw agricultural products, and we have been debating measures since this session has convened looking toward aid to agriculture; but I confess that I do not think we have passed very many practical measures along that line. I hope that we will pass at least one before the session ends. I am one who thinks the session will end pretty soon. I do not need any propaganda to convince me that the business interests of this country will be pretty thankful the day we adjourn. We ought to get right down to business and pass some of the needful legislation and adjourn at an early date.

I hope the resolution passed by the Democratic convention in my State will receive favorable attention at the hands of the country at large, and that before we meet here again some conference will be held whereby we can enlarge our trade, whereby the markets of the world will be opened up, and whereby the producers of agricultural products will feel encouraged to make renewed efforts and feel that they are beginning to get just compensation for what they produce.

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD PROPAGANDA

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate Resolution 124, relating to railroad propaganda.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may we not have the amendment to the amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 11, before the semicolon, insert a comma and the following words:

or the expense of the publication of a newspaper or the contribution of financial support, directly or indirectly, toward the expense for the publication of a newspaper.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Idaho if the amendment just read, or the substance of it, is not already comprised within the resolution as reported by the committee?

Mr. GOODING. I think the amendment makes it a little clearer and more definite. I believe the amendment rather improves the resolution.

Mr. KING. May I inquire also of the Senator whether the provision still remains calling for an investigation of chambers of commerce and clubs and civic organizations?

Mr. GOODING. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce will offer an amendment to eliminate that provision on page 5, line 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida to the committee amendment.

On a division the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL subsequently submitted an amendment to the resolution (S. Res. 134), which was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.

POSTMASTERS AND POSTAL EMPLOYEES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 1898.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1898) to readjust the compensation of postmasters and reclassify and readjust the salaries and compensation of employees in the Postal Service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will read the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

CONDITIONS RESPECTING RECLAMATION PROJECTS

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before we formally take up the bill for reading I want to call attention to a matter which ought to engage our attention if arrangements are being made, as I understand they are, for final adjournment. It is contemplated, so it is said, that we will adjourn about the 7th of June. If that is the program I trust that those who have in charge the arrangement for adjournment will take into consideration that it is absolutely necessary that some legislation be had with reference to our reclamation projects before adjournment takes place. The conditions with reference to agriculture are serious enough in different parts of the country, but the conditions are even more serious in many respects upon the reclamation projects. They have not only had to meet the burdens and face the conditions which agriculturists generally have had to meet, but in addition to that they have had to meet the expense of maintenance charges and construction charges which have created a real crisis with reference to the projects.

Some time ago the President appointed what is known as a fact-finding commission to look into conditions on these projects. That fact-finding commission has now reported and there is a bill pending in the House and also now one in the Senate designed to carry out the program as outlined by the fact-finding commission. It is in the nature of relief to the projects and also involves in a measure a reconstruction or redrafting, as it were, of the reclamation law. It is a very important piece of legislation, and unless there is enacted that legislation or some similar legislation, legislation in the way of relief, there will be thousands of settlers lose their homes before the Congress comes into session next December.

It is in every sense, therefore, a situation which demands that the Congress act before it adjourns. It is not a subject which calls into consideration many different phases of the economic and industrial and agricultural situation, like other bills which are pending with reference to general agricultural relief. It is, in a sense, a very simple proposition. It is a case where the United States Government is the creditor and the people upon the lands are the debtors. It is a simple proposition of whether the Government will readjust the situation so as to enable these people to retain the homes which they have been striving to open up and maintain for the last 10 or 15 years.

I call attention to this only briefly to-day, because it is not my purpose to take up the time of the Senate while another bill is pending and go into detail in regard to the matter, but for the reason that it is practically impossible and to my mind inconceivable that the Congress would attempt to adjourn until that legislation is taken care of. I trust that those who have in charge the situation will not contemplate any such program. I should be compelled to oppose it in every way at my command.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. May I ask the Senator from Idaho if he knows the status of the legislation in the House?

Mr. BORAH. The bill now seems to be upon the verge of being reported out of the committee, and it is believed that a rule will be reported for the purpose of having it considered in the House. It may take some little time. We are simply using our time against the settlers' homes, and I imagine we have plenty of time for that purpose.

Mr. DIAL. May I ask the Senator if it is contemplated to cancel the debt?

Mr. BORAH. I myself have not any such program in contemplation, but I understand there was a provision in the Smith bill as it was originally introduced contemplating marking off part of the debt.

Mr. SMOOT. But that has no reference whatever to the six projects to which the Senator from Idaho has referred at the present time.

Mr. DIAL. How much is contemplated wiping off?

Mr. BORAH. I do not recall the exact figures. I am not asking at this time to mark off any of the debt. We are simply asking an opportunity under the circumstances to pay the debt; we are asking for time.

Mr. DIAL. The Senator merely wants an extension of time?

Mr. BORAH. That is the first consideration. But the bill deals with the whole subject.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator whether this is contemplated? From a statement in the Washington Post of April 11 it appears that "a comprehensive overhauling of the Government reclamation program, involving the charging off as a total loss of $27,391,146 of the approximately $150,000,000 invested, and providing measures of relief to thousands of farmers and permission for further Federal expenditures on irrigation of the arid wastes of the West is urged in the report submitted by Secretary Work."

The article further said there are 3 projects pronounced as failures and 28 more in danger. I am wondering if the bill contemplates a remedy for that situation?

Mr. BORAH. The bill, as I recall, as it was originally introduced from the House—I do not know its terms at this time, because they have been working on it—did contemplate marking off a part of the debt. I did not give very much consideration to that because I have not been an advocate of marking off the debt at this time. I have felt that could be dealt with later. We are not asking for relief from any part of the debt, but if that is objectionable and when the bill comes here it has in it any such provision, we can soon dispose of it, because that is not the thing with which we are now immediately concerned. We are now immediately concerned with such relief legislation as will give more time to pay the debt, so far as we are concerned, speaking now for my State. These people have given every evidence of good faith. But under the circumstances they must have relief and they must have it before this session closes. What I desire and what I shall insist upon is that the bill be taken up; the details we can discuss when the bill is before us.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For what purpose?

Mr. EDGE. Merely to make a statement with reference to the unanimous-consent agreement now in effect. It will take me only about a minute to make the statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I want to speak on the subject that is now before the Senate as presented by the remarks of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and I do not want the discussion to get beyond that matter. If it is merely for a one-minute statement, of course I will yield to the Senator, but if he desires to make a speech on some subject, I can not yield.

Mr. EDGE. I merely desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, in all fairness to the Senate, that under the unanimous-consent agreement after 4 o'clock this afternoon the debate on the pending unfinished business will be limited to 10 minutes on amendments and 10 minutes on the bill. Of course, I appreciate that any subject may be discussed in the meantime, but I repeat that at 4 o'clock we are limited in the discussion of the postal bill to 20 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, and it is a wise one. It is unfortunate that the Senate does not pursue a policy of discussing the issue before the Senate on all questions.

Mr. EDGE. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rarely speak, and I do not intend to occupy any great length of time now.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has called the attention of the Senate to a matter of grave importance to his people and to the people of the adjoining States which requires attention before final adjournment; and I wish to say to that Senator, that so far as I am concerned, I am in entire sympathy with him, although I live in a different section of the country, where irrigation has no part whatever in our life as a State or in the pursuits of our people. I recall many years ago when the first irrigation bill was introduced, I was then a member of the committee, in the House of Representatives, having charge of the measure. The bill was reported out of the committee by one vote, and I cast my vote in favor of giving an opportunity to the western people to assemble the rain water of their States and use it in order to make the land produce and to enable the people to prosper. I have never changed my mind on that subject. I have always supported the irrigation projects of the West; and so far as concerns the suggestion that is made here that possibly some of the indebtedness that is due the Government from settlers on irrigation projects shall be marked off, I am not adverse to that suggestion.

Without intending to reflect on anybody, I know that through the shifting of the political sands, the natural drift of political sentiment, we probably have gone into some irrigation projects in the West which will not pay on the basis of the cost of irrigation; and yet we have invited people to go upon those lands, to settle upon them, and to make their homes there, and their homes are now involved.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just a moment until I finish this thought.

Unless the Government of the United States is going to look the question in the face, acknowledge its own mistake, and readjust the charges on those lands in such a way that the men living on them can earn a livelihood, the question will never be solved and we shall have bankrupt people there fighting for their homes. I think the problem should be adjusted, and I am in thorough accord with the sentiment which has been expressed by the Senator from Idaho in favor of an adjustment before this session of Congress shall finally adjourn.

I now yield to the Senator from Wyoming, if he desires that I shall do so.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that in the initiation of a reclamation project there is a dual responsibility between the Government and the settler whereby they attempt together to reclaim an otherwise desolate section of country. Even though it should be found necessary to write off a part of the original cost of irrigation as to one or more projects, it does not follow that the responsibility of the resulting loss should fall altogether on the settler.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I stated.

Mr. KENDRICK. That is true because, as the irrigation service is a new branch of governmental activity, it is only natural that that service should make mistakes, and they have made mistakes. It is not only unfair to impose the burden of those mistakes altogether upon the settlers but it is uneconomical to the Government for the Government to insist upon payments which the settler can not make.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. KENDRICK. It is in the interest of good business judgment that the Government shall not insist upon such payments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Government could continue to allow the settlers to stay on the land and the settlers living on the land could make the money with which to pay the Government back, of course the Government would be entitled to its money; but if a situation has arisen on some of these irrigation projects where it is absolutely impossible for the settlers to make such a return as will enable them to pay the Government back, should the Government insist on such payment, we should be destroying homesteads and accomplish nothing for the Government.

Mr. KENDRICK. In other words, the Government would be merely indulging in a fruitless effort to wear out two or three sets of settlers in order to take care of the responsibilities of one set.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Alabama proceeds to discuss the other subject on which he intends to address the Senate, I wish to say that I agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the most important thing is to get action in reference to this matter. In what shape the bill shall be finally passed is far less material than passing some remedial legislation, which is essential.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] has asked if the bill does not contemplate writing off a part of this indebtedness. I say that it does. The only indebtedness, however, that I know of which it intends to write is the increased indebtedness over that which was represented to be the cost originally of irrigation by reason of the mistakes of the Government. I am not blaming the Government for those mistakes, however. For instance, in one case the Reclamation Service estimated that they could get so much water from a certain water supply. That water, it was estimated, would irrigate 150,000 acres of land. It turned out, however, that the water available would irrigate only 80,000 acres of land, so the total cost of the reservoir site had to be divided amongst 80,000 acres of land instead of 150,000 acres.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was an engineering mistake.

Mr. PITTMAN. It was an engineering mistake. The one who should stand any loss occurring through the mistake is the one who is responsible for it; that is fundamental; but in the long run there will be no loss to the Government. Why? Because the money that has gone into these projects, whether it be a part of it that is written off or not paid back by the settler, has not come from taxation of the people of this country. It has come from the disposal of the public lands and from the royalties derived from the natural resources of the public lands of the Western States. So it does not lie in the mouth of anyone to make complaint.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should be glad to yield to my friend, but I really rose to discuss another subject, and I should like to get to it.

Mr. KENDRICK. I will interrupt the Senator for only a moment. I wish to say that I indorse all that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has said in connection with the necessity of action on the particular measure referred to. Moreover, relief from the present situation is so vitally important to our people that I for one shall vote against final adjournment unless action can be had upon this and other farm legislation.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. I do not want to impose upon the good nature of my friend from Alabama, but at the proper time some of us will have something to say about this matter. The resources to which reference has been made belong to the people of the United States and not to the people of particular States, and I am not in favor of cancellation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if my friends will allow me, I do not like to interfere with the debate on the subject which has been discussed, but there is something that I rose to say which I think is pertinent to the question of adjournment and pertinent to the desire that our western friends have in asking that the people who live in the West shall be treated fairly. So far as I know, Members of the House and Senate from the section of the Union from which I come have almost uniformly and unanimously voted with the people of the West to develop their irrigation projects and build their homesteads. We have, however, before Congress a problem that came from the war, a problem that has been knocking at the doors here so long that a great many Members of the House and of the Senate are disposed to treat it in a light vein, as if it were not a matter of importance. Nevertheless, it is a problem that is of vital interest not only to the Government but to the people particularly of the section of the country which I in part represent. It is a problem that is here to be solved; and yet we mark time from day to day. I will say to the Members of the Senate who ask us to see that they shall have an opportunity for the consideration of measures affecting the great irrigation projects in their section that when the time comes for the consideration of the problem to which I refer, which is of vital importance to us, we who give you our support are relegated to the rear; we are held in committee; we are driven away from the front line and not given an opportunity for the consideration of that problem which is pressing the Government at this hour.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I will say to the Senator that if he has reference to the Senator from Idaho standing in its way, I am perfectly willing to take up the Muscle Shoals legislation to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. BORAH. I have never voted against taking it up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I am in accord with the statement he has made to-day because I think it is just, but I think it is equally just that before an adjournment is had the Members of the Senate shall be given an opportunity for a fair vote on the Muscle Shoals project.

Mr. BORAH. I will cooperate with the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator for his cooperation.

Mr. KING. I will help the Senator, also.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the Senator from Utah.

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a great dam was projected during the war and was half completed when the Congress of the United States scrapped it and left it idle for more than a year. Then it was taken up again, and an appropriation was made to go on with the work. That work to-day is nearing completion, and within a year from this time the greatest dam in the United States will be completed, and not only will the dam be completed, but the hydraulic power machinery will be in place, and it will merely be necessary to attach the wires to enable the people of the United States to enjoy the industrial and economic development that will come from the completion of this great work.

We have taken up the matter several times. Some years ago I aided in passing a bill through the Senate for the disposition of Muscle Shoals when completed. The bill failed. The Secretary of War, acting under the direction of the then President of the United States, said that the present administration would not lend itself to the operation of this great plant by the Government; that it must be done by private enterprise, and he asked for bids. Then Mr. Henry Ford, a competent man and capable financially, submitted a bid. I have always contended that when Mr. Ford was invited by the Government to submit a bid on a project, and it was properly laid before the Congress by the Secretary of War, he was entitled either to the acceptance or rejection of his bid. We have met our fate in committees; we have been kept out on the side lines; and everybody who knows anything knows that the final disposition of this power question can not be had until a vote on the Ford proposal is had in the Senate.

Senators from the West appeal to us to help them in what is a natural desire to take care of their constituencies, and yet when it comes to a proposition that means putting into operation within a year a completed plant, or deciding whether it is wiser to dispose of this great power for the making of fertilizer for the farmers of America, or to dispose of it in some other way, we are not given an opportunity to consider it; and that result is brought about by their votes, because the committee having the matter in charge to-day is dominated by the votes of this very western country. I do not say that they have a majority, but they have the dominating votes, which up to this hour have prevented this matter from being considered by the United States Senate.

I am not saying how any man shall vote. My own mind is made up. I believe that the Ford proposal is the best that has come before the Government; but I am not quarreling with any other man as to how he should vote. I do say, however, that our friends from the West, who have received our help, who have accomplished great results in that western country by the power of our votes, are not in a position to stand in the Senate and say that we ought not to adjourn because there is pending legislation of vital need to their constituents, when they sit in the committee and on the skirmish lines of the Senate and delay and prevent an honest and a straight vote on this problem, which must be determined. It must be determined not only in the interest of the people who will receive the benefit of this development but in the interest of the Government.

Everybody knows that we can not dispose of this matter at the short session of Congress. Everybody knows that if we are going to distribute this electricity from the wheels that will be ready to turn within a year, it will take time and money to lay the great lines of wire that will distribute it to the country. Everybody knows that if we are going to use it off the wheels at the place where it is generated, we must prepare the plants to use it. We are approaching that hour; it will arrive within a year and it will take all of the year to prepare for it; and yet, when we say "Vote!" we are locked in a committee by the very men who ask our help.

I want to say that I do not believe in legislation by revenge. I do not believe in voting against a good legislative proposition because you receive bad treatment at the hands of its advocates. I do say, however, that I should not be properly representing the constituency from whom I hold a commission or properly representing the Government of the United States, when you say you desire a vote on a great and meritorious project in your country, if I did not say to you that justice also demands that this Muscle Shoals proposition should be disposed of before this session of Congress adjourns.

I say that not by way of a threat—because I will say to the Senator that no matter how he or his friends vote on the proposition it will not deter me from doing justice to his people—but I say it by way of appeal. Regardless of how you may feel on the final vote, I think we are entitled to your help in seeing that consideration of this question is granted before adjournment takes place.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I shall take only a moment; but I want very heartily to thank the Senators who have preceded me for their good intentions concerning irrigation. There is no question but that there is an emergency along that line that ought to receive our attention before we adjourn.

I want to say further to my friend, the Senator from Birmingham (Alabama)—I say "Birmingham" because that is known the world over—that I stand ready to vote at any moment upon the matter in which he is so much interested, first because it is one of the things that we ought to dispose of, and second because, as the Senator has stated, his help has always been ours in these matters of irrigation, and we have no right to ignore the wishes of one State more than another. We are all together, North, South, East, and West.

POSTMASTERS AND POSTAL EMPLOYEES

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1898) to readjust the compensation of postmasters and reclassify and readjust the salaries and compensation of employees in the Postal Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I request that the bill be read. It has not yet been read.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the committee is to be now read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the committee is a substitute for the entire bill.

Mr. EDGE. For the entire bill? It has not been read.

Mr. FLETCHER. It has not been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At this parliamentary stage an amendment may be offered either to the text of the original bill or to the substitute proposed by the committee.

Mr. EDGE. That is as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The PRINCIPAL CLERK. The committee proposes to strike all after the enacting clause, and to insert:

INCONSISTENT ACTS REPEALED

SEC. 13. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with this act are hereby amended or repealed.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, on page 39, line 22, I move to strike out "3" and insert "4," so as to make it read "4 cents" instead of "3 cents."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves that in line 22, page 39, the numeral "3" be stricken out and the numeral "4" be inserted.

Mr. DIAL. This just brings the compensation of this class of officials up to the average pay of the other employees. These people have to travel over all kinds of roads in various parts of our country, in all kinds of weather, and it seems to me just that they should receive this increase.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I want to say a word on the proposed amendment. The committee's suggestion, which has been read, is to allow the rural mail carriers 3 cents per mile per day for each mile or major fraction of a mile scheduled on their routes. As Senators know, the star route is a route of 24 miles, approximately. The committee gave very careful consideration to this particular question, and they felt that 3 cents a mile, which will aggregate approximately $230 for a star route, was a very substantial increase, and quite sufficient. In other words, this bill, as I take it the Senate understands, is a compromise bill, made up from the consideration of a number of bills introduced in both the House and the Senate.

The original bills, covering all branches of the service, called for increases in salary of $600 for clerks and carriers, and relative increases all along the line. At the same time those bills proposed a mileage of 6 cents per mile for the rural mail carriers.

Our final decision, the bill before the Senate, was a compromise of 50 per cent. In other words, we are providing in the bill for a raise of $300 in the entrance salary of clerks and carriers, and relative raises all along the line. In the case of the rural mail carriers, following the same policy and theory, we provided for 50 per cent of the 6 cents per mile, or 3 cents, as the bill reads.

It will be recalled that the rural mail carriers already have salaries of $1,800, where the ordinary carrier under existing law has a salary of $1,400, going up $100 per year for five years, until his highest possible salary is $1,800. We are raising that to $1,700 as the entrance salary, going up to $2,100 after a service of five years. But even then, under the bill, if it should be enacted into law, the entrance salary will be $1,700, while the salary of the rural carrier is $1,800 under existing law. There are almost 50,000 rural carriers in the United States, and this rate of 3 cents per mile which we have fixed in the bill will make their salaries approximately $2,030 a year.

True, the rural mail carrier has certain equipment to maintain, usually a Ford car, and it is in consideration of that that this extra salary is given. He has enjoyed the salary of $1,800 as compared to $1,400 paid the city carrier, who has no such equipment to maintain.

I thoroughly appreciate the great service the rural carriers render, and I think they are justly entitled to a substantial raise, but the committee felt and unanimously decided that 3 cents was an adequate salary, which, in view of all the circumstances, would be satisfactory to the carriers.

As a matter of fact, although we have had public hearings extending over 10 days, there has been no request brought before our committee for more than 3 cents. The Government can afford to give them 4 or 5 or 6 cents, of course, and they would no doubt be glad to have it, but it appeals to me as a business proposition that in view of all the surrounding circumstances this 3 cents affords a very substantial increase and is all the Government should give at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. The provision for these increases seems to me to be justified and very wise, but it has been suggested that the Government may, in order to meet these increases, be obliged to raise postal rates on parcel post. Is there any plan of that sort in contemplation? I am opposed to an increase in the rates on parcel post.

Mr. EDGE. There is no provision in the bill now before the Senate for an increase in the rates on any class of postage. The matter was given very careful consideration, and I will be glad to advise the Senator what contributed to our final decision, if he desires to have me do so. There is nothing in this bill touching the subject of revenue.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know there is nothing in this bill along that line; but does the Senator estimate that we can take care of these increases without increasing the rates on parcel post?

Mr. EDGE. Yes; I do; and I figure we can take care of this very handily, judging by our experience in the past. There have been four distinct raises in the last 30 or 35 years, I think, and in no case was the raise accompanied by any change in the rates. The raises were absorbed by the increased business, the natural increase that came on from year to year, and in no case was the Government in any way embarrassed in meeting any of its obligations. However, the existing law provides that the Post Office Department may, without legislation, as the Senator probably knows, increase the rates if it sees fit to do so, and if the Interstate Commerce Commission approves of such increases as shall be stipulated. At the present time there is in progress an investigation called a cost ascertainment, which will be completed in a few months, as to the cost of maintaining the various branches of the department. A year ago we appropriated half a million dollars for that specific purpose. They have been working on that for several months, and, as I said, it is nearing completion. We felt that even though some increases might be justified we were not justified in stipulating them to-day without that full information.

If that information develops that the parcel-post rates should be and can be raised and still be below express rates, as I have said, the Post Office Department have full power to raise the rates, if the Interstate Commerce Commission agree. It is not necessary, in the judgment of the committee, in absorbing this increased expense, to make any specific changes in postal rates at this time.

Mr. BORAH. How much additional expense to the Government will this bill create?

Mr. EDGE. According to the department's figures, which practically agree with the committee's figures, a little less than $60,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator expect that that will be taken care of by increased business in the Post Office Department?

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator is interested in what has happened before, I can give him the figures in a few moments.

Mr. BORAH. I just want to know if that is the way the Senator expects it will be taken care of?

Mr. EDGE. This is what has happened: The last general increase in salary occurred in 1921; that is, by the law approved June 5, 1920. The deficit that year amounted to $80,000,000. It was reduced in the following year to $67,000,000, and to $37,000,000 in the fiscal year 1923. As a matter of fact, the actual deficit for the fiscal year 1923, as reported by the Postmaster General, was only $28,000,000. The postal receipts of 1923 were approximately $48,000,000 in excess of the revenue for 1922, while the operating expenses for 1923 were but $18,000,000 in excess of the operating expenses for 1922, showing a gain of approximately $30,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. What is the deficit this year?

Mr. EDGE. About $20,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. If we add $60,000,000 to that, we will have a deficit of about $80,000,000.

Mr. EDGE. I do not mean to give the impression that we can absorb it all in a year, but it will be gradually absorbed, as it has been done before.

Mr. BORAH. In the meantime, we have to have the money.

Mr. EDGE. The appropriations given to the Post Office Department have permitted them in the past to meet their obligations and their bills regularly.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, is it the policy of the committee to proceed with increases without reference to the income? Is it the policy to ignore the income from postal rates and proceed to take care of the deficit from the Treasury?

Mr. EDGE. The Senator has asked me that question, and, speaking personally, I consider that this should be decided on this basis: Either these men are entitled to the increase in salary or they are not. It does not make a particle of difference, in my judgment, in considering the merits of this bill, whether the income of the Post Office Department is sufficient to meet the increases or not. I believe they are entitled to the increases specified under the bill, and if it creates a deficit of $100,000,000 then the income in the General Treasury should meet it. That is my personal view.

Mr. FESS. That is precisely what I wanted to know. If we open up that sluiceway for pouring out the money, where is our protection? It seems to me that the Postal Service ought to be self-sustaining. That has been the policy of the country from the beginning. If we are going to increase salaries, why not revise the postal rates so as to meet the increase?

Mr. EDGE. It is my understanding, though I have not the figures before me, that the Post Office Department has usually shown a deficit at the end of each year. There may have been some years that it made its expenses, but it has shown a deficit recently.

Mr. FESS. But nothing like the deficit the Senator is proposing now.

Mr. EDGE. I just read to the Senator about the deficit of $80,000,000 in 1921.

Mr. FESS. That was immediately following the repeal of the 3-cent postage rate.

Mr. EDGE. It was immediately following the increase in salaries of June 5, 1920.

Mr. FESS. Yes; and the repeal of the 3-cent postage, which probably was a mistake.

Mr. EDGE. I think it was about that time.

Mr. FESS. Does not the Senator believe that we ought to have all the facts from the survey that is now being conducted before we launch upon this general policy?

Mr. EDGE. The Senator does believe that we should have the facts that are now being obtained before we make an effort to revise the postal rates, but he does not believe that the ascertainment of those facts has the slightest relationship, in his judgment, to the merit of the salary increase at this time.

Mr. FESS. There are agencies of the Government that will not be self-sustaining, and that is very apparent; but the Postal Service is one that touches every citizen, and it seems to me the citizen using the Postal Service should pay for the service. That sounds to me like a rational policy to pursue.

Mr. EDGE. That policy possibly has considerable logic. I am not going to argue that. After the commission has ascertained all the facts, the next session of Congress in December can consider a revision of the postal rates, but that, to my mind, is no justification to continue the present standard of salaries until some other department of the Government has been taken care of.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I would like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he is in favor of starving the employees of the Postal Service in the meantime until those facts can be reported and Congress determine whether the postal rates shall be increased?

Mr. FESS. The Senator from North Dakota knows there are any number of people who would be very glad to accept service with the Government in the Postal Service on the salaries that are now being paid.

Mr. FRAZIER. And the Senator from Ohio knows that employees there now have to live and keep their families.

Mr. FESS. That is true; and other people have to do the same thing. I have understood that in comparison of the incomes of persons who are employed in other industries outside of the Government with those of the postal clerks they are paid less than our postal clerks draw.

Mr. EDGE. In that connection I draw attention without taking the time——

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me just a moment?

Mr. EDGE. As soon as I answer the question of the Senator from Ohio which he has just presented. If the Senator from Ohio will look over the report submitted by the committee on the pending bill, he will find that we have reprinted there tables covering a number of different types of service which, so far as we could determine, were comparable to this type of service and efficiency and the necessity for knowledge along various lines. He will find in most of the comparisons that the other types of employment are much better paid than the Postal Service.

Mr. FESS. But does the Senator include the 30 days' sick leave and 30 days' vacation and the legal holidays in the comparison?

Mr. EDGE. I am not sufficiently familiar with all the privileges given in other lines of business to go into complete detail in that respect.

Mr. FESS. Does not the Senator know that few if any of them give two months in that way?

Mr. EDGE. I think most of the large corporations and large industrial enterprises in these days permit fairly liberal vacations and sick leave. They have all types of new progressive innovations to take care of their employees. Some have one form and some have another.

Mr. FESS. I know of no great corporation that gives two months, as the Federal Government does.

Mr. EDGE. I do not know that they give two months, but I know they do many things for their employees, and so does the Senator from Ohio know it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did I understand the Senator from New Jersey to say in response to a question of the Senator from Florida that there is a general law authorizing the Postmaster General to increase rates on mail matter?

Mr. EDGE. No; but on parcel-post matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. He has that general power?

Mr. EDGE. He has the power on second-class matter to regulate the rate and change the rate with the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. OVERMAN. Where will that be found and when was that power granted?

Mr. EDGE. I can not answer the Senator's question as to when the law was passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Was it in a general post office bill?

Mr. EDGE. Perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will be able to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. STERLING. I am not able to say when the law was enacted, but I understand that it is the general law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I understand it is general law, but I am wondering when the power was delegated to the head of the department to increase postal rates.

Mr. STERLING. He was given that power in conjunction with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. EDGE. I think it is a part of the parcel post law. It was enacted before I came to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator have reference to the $100 increase per annum beginning some six or seven years ago?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I am asking about the right of the Postmaster General to increase rates on parcel post mail matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was asking about the increase in salary.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from New Jersey told me there is that authority granted to the Postmaster General himself.

Mr. EDGE. Authority is granted to the Post Office Department, which means the Postmaster General, to file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a schedule or revision of rates covering the Parcel Post Service. If it receives their approval, it is promulgated and goes into effect.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is authority given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, then?

Mr. EDGE. The law was enacted several years ago. I am not at all familiar with its details, but that is my general information.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think we had authority to grant to the head of the department the right to raise postal rates?

Mr. EDGE. I will have to refer that question to Senators with legal knowledge.

Mr. STERLING. I have asked the clerk of the committee to bring a copy of the law to me so I can read it to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would like to know how that was done. I think it is very doubtful. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator was telling what the increase would be as to rural carriers. I would like to know now what increase the city carriers will receive.

Mr. EDGE. The increase to city carriers is $300 from the present minimum of $1,400 to a new minimum of $1,700. The increase to rural carriers is by adding to the $1,800 an additional 3 cents a mile, which is computed to aggregate about $230 a year, which would be a total of $2,030.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose we have a maximum salary for city carriers; what increase do they get?

Mr. EDGE. They are increased $100 per year for five years, and they reach their maximum at the end of five years. Seventeen hundred dollars is the entrance salary and $2,200 is the maximum.

Mr. OVERMAN. But some of them get $2,000 now, I think.

Mr. EDGE. Oh, no. The city carrier's minimum now is $1,400 and the maximum $1,800.

Mr. OVERMAN. They will get a $100 increase every year until the end of five years?

Mr. EDGE. One hundred dollars increase each year up to the end of five years, when they reach the maximum.

Mr. OVERMAN. In considering the bill in the committee, was the question of increasing parcel-post rates taken into consideration?

Mr. EDGE. Yes. The department had, at the suggestion of the committee, submitted various methods through which an increase in revenue could be obtained. One of the methods was to increase the parcel-post rates on a gradual graded basis, which I can not repeat to the Senator, but the estimated increased income on that basis would have been about $30,000,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know they had that under consideration. I am opposed to increasing the parcel-post rates myself, but I want to understand whether or not the bill was framed and reported with the understanding that the department would increase the rates?

Mr. EDGE. Absolutely not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand it, there is no scheme connected with this legislation which proposes to take care of the increased expenditure through any increase in rates in the Post Office Department with reference to the parcel post.

Mr. EDGE. There is no scheme, even including parcel post, so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I said. In other words, the increased expenditure has to be taken care of by simply going and taking it out of the Treasury?

Mr. EDGE. Or by the increased business which we believe will gradually absorb it as it has in the past.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the Senator in that connection what will be the deficit in postal revenues as compared to the expenditures the first year if this measure should go into effect?

Mr. EDGE. The increased expenditure or income, which did the Senator say?

Mr. ROBINSON. My question was as to what deficit, if any, would arise?

Mr. EDGE. Of course, that is problematical; but the bill itself will require approximately a $60,000,000 greater expenditure.

Mr. ROBINSON. I heard that statement made a few moments ago in answer to a question propounded by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. EDGE. We are adding $60,000,000 to the expense. That is reasonable to assume, judging from the fact that the income of the department, business being normal, as it seems to be, would be approximately $40,000,000. Of course, that is problematical. The deficit will unquestionably have to be made up and ought to be made up out of the General Treasury.

Mr. BORAH. How much does the Senator think the deficit will be in round figures?

Mr. EDGE. The Senator can figure that just as readily as I. If they now have a deficit of $20,000,000 and we add $60,000,000 to their expenses, that would be $80,000,000, but with an increase of $40,000,000 in receipts there would be apparently a deficit of $40,000,000, if my figures are correct.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator should admit that appropriations have been increased for the coming year to take care of the growing business, so that he can not take the increase that is already given in the appropriation bill and deduct it from the deficit. I have not any doubt in the world that the deficit would be $65,000,000 at least, if not more.

Mr. EDGE. It was $80,000,000 two years ago.

Mr. SMOOT. We are not providing for that now. There was a deficit the year before that, and we are not counting now, in the receipts and expenditures of the Government, on any deficit from the Post Office Department. Whatever deficit there may be, we have provided no means of meeting it.

Mr. EDGE. We do not provide a deficit that would probably be developed or brought about in passing the soldiers' bonus law. We went through with the tax bill irrespective of whether it would provide money for that or not.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is a habit we have.

Mr. EDGE. Then do not entirely consider this as an innovation.

Mr. BORAH. We do not break the habit, it seems.

Mr. EDGE. We should not consider this an innovation where we are trying to look after 300,000 postal employees.

Mr. BORAH. I have not any doubt that all the salaries ought in some respects and in some instances to be increased, of the carriers in particular, but it does seem to me that the Post Office Service ought to pay for it, either out of increased parcel-post rates or in some other way.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Idaho, with the permission of the Senator from New Jersey, that I have had many, many protests from all over the country against increased parcel-post rates. I do not think there is a farmers' organization in the West that has not sent a protest to me against any increase in parcel-post rates. They claim that it would simply mean an added burden upon the farmers in the West, and of course those in the East as well. I do not think there is a State in the East, too, that has not protested.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; the farmers would also send petitions here and protest against an increase in taxes by the Government, but the farmer must understand and the citizen must understand that he has to pay this at last. There is nobody else to pay it. We have not any money except what we collect from the gentleman who is protesting.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. DALE. This matter of increase in parcel-post rates has come particularly to my attention. The protests from the farmers against the increase are largely the result of propaganda. Now, the fact is that the farmer does not send 1 per cent of the parcel-post mail, and he receives only about 8 per cent, so that of all the parcel-post business that comes to and goes from the farmer he does not receive to exceed 9 per cent. I am inclined to agree with the Senator that the parcel-post rates ought to be raised to meet this apparent deficit, but the protest does not come from the farmer by any means.

Mr. BORAH. I think the bill ought to provide in some way to take care of the expenditures.

Mr. EDGE. That is a matter of policy.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I merely wish to cite the law which gives the Interstate Commerce Commission some power in this regard. I read from the law of 1912, as follows:

> The classification of articles mailable as well as the weight limit, the rates of postage, zone or zones, and other conditions of mailability under this act, if the Postmaster General shall find on experience that they or any of them are such as to prevent the shipment of articles desirable, or to permanently render the cost of the service greater than the receipts of the revenue therefrom, he is hereby authorized, subject to the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission after investigation, to re-form from time to time such classification, weight limit, rates, zone or zones or conditions, or either, in order to promote the service to the public or to insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have spoken on the amendment which has been offered and said all that I care to say. With the view of trying to keep the bill down as far as possible and still do full justice I oppose the amendment increasing the allowance. I believe that the committee after giving careful consideration to the question have equitably and fairly divided the increases. One cent a mile will add to the bill, as I recall the figures, something over $3,500,000. I feel that we would be doing justice without increasing the allowance 1 cent a mile above the amount provided in the bill.

Mr. FRAZIER. I believe, Mr. President, that rural carriers are entitled to 4 cents a mile. The salaries of the city carriers have been increased $300. Three cents per mile would be an increase of $230.32 a year while 4 cents a mile would be but $293.76 per year. That is less than the $300 advance given to the city carriers. This increase would go to help enable the rural carriers to keep up their equipment. Most rural carriers are compelled not only to own a team of horses but a car as well; and the cost of their equipment amounts to three or four times at least what 4 cents a mile would yield them. I think they are entitled to 4 cents a mile.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRAZIER. I offer an amendment on page 15, line 14, to strike out the numerals "$7" and insert "$5."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The PRINCIPAL CLERK. On page 15, line 14, after the word "exceed," it is proposed to strike out "$7" and insert "$5," so as to read, "not to exceed $5 per day."

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, $5 is the amount allowed by law at the present time, as I understand. I wish to say that while the $7 maximum may not be too much, yet any postal employee who receives $2,500 a year or less receives less than $7 per day for salary to cover board and everything else. It costs something to board even at home, and I believe the inspectors can live upon $5 a day when they are out on the road. So I think the per diem allowance should be cut down from $7 to $5.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what ought to be done is to change this per diem allowance to $4. That is the allowance made in the case of most of the other departments. In the revenue bill that has just been agreed to by the House of Representatives a per diem allowance of $4 is provided for certain employees who will be required to travel in connection with the administration of that law. We felt that we should like to make it $5, but we came to the conclusion that the amount ought to be made uniform as to all the departments of the Government. It is true that a $7 maximum applies to officers in the Department of State and, perhaps, to one or two of the other departments of the Government whose officials serve outside of the United States; but the allowance in all other cases practically is but $4 per diem. I was talking to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee to-day, who thought that in connection with the next deficiency appropriation bill we ought to enact a provision of law making the allowance $5 per diem instead of $4.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I wish to say that I agree with him fully. The Senator will recall the appeals which have come to us in considering practically all the appropriation bills to increase the allowance from $4 to $7 a day, but we have uniformly held it down to $4. I am in favor of the pending bill, but these inspectors ought not to have any greater per diem allowance than have other Government officials.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that if the Senator from North Dakota will modify his amendment so as to make the allowance $4 a day and let that go in the bill, in case the per diem allowance for other employees of the Government is later increased to $5 we will include in the increased allowance the employees covered by this bill.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, do I understand that employees in other branches of the service who are compelled to travel are given an allowance of $4 a day, or does the law stipulate not exceeding $4?

Mr. SMOOT. Not exceeding $4.

Mr. EDGE. Is that the language of the law as applied to all other departments?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the language used with the exceptions I have stated. It is true, as the Senator from North Dakota has said, that while the employees are away they have no expenses at home, but I do not believe, even taking that into consideration, and considering also the manner in which living expenses have increased, that $4 will be sufficient; but I am quite sure that $5 will be.

Mr. EDGE. The present law gives them a per diem of $5.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like the Senator having the bill in charge to accept the amendment providing for $4. Then, if any change shall be made in the next deficiency appropriation bill, we will cover all of the departments alike.

Mr. EDGE. I can not accept the amendment providing for a per diem of $4. I was prepared to accept the present rate, which is $5 per day. That is the present law, and it has been so, as I understand, for a long time. The department recommended the increase from $5 to $7, as I recall. This increased allowance only covers inspectors of the Post Office Department, as I understand. It does not refer to railway mail clerks and other employees. They are allowed very much less—50 cents a meal, or $2 a day. They are not supposed to sleep away from home. The inspectors, on the other hand, are away from their homes almost continually. They are engaged in ferreting out crime and various infractions of the postal laws. We all know that in large cities they are compelled to keep up on an average certainly a better appearance than most men; they must go to pretty good hotels, and certainly $4 a day in these times for a man acting in the capacity of a post-office inspector would seem to be entirely too little. I am prepared to accept the amendment as originally offered at $5 and to put the per diem back where it now is.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all that the Senator from New Jersey has said in reference to certain inspectors in the Post Office Department may be said about the inspectors in all of the departments of our Government. I know that as the revenue bill, which has just passed, was reported to the House it provided a per diem of $7 per day for certain inspectors and employees of the Board of Tax Appeals. That was cut to $4 a day, and it was promised the conferees, as I have already stated, that we would try to secure the passage of a law covering the matter and providing a uniform allowance of $5.

I want a vote on the amendment, and if the Senator from North Dakota does not wish to change his amendment providing a per diem of $4 a day, taking into consideration the statements which I have made, then I shall move an amendment making the per diem allowance $4 a day instead of $5.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word or two. I hope under the conditions that the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will not prevail. I think that $5 per day is little enough for men occupying positions as inspectors and supervisory employees in the Postal Service. Considering their station in life, the business they have to perform, the kind of hotels at which they must stop, and so forth, I think $5 per day is not excessive. I think the compensation ought at least to be that much.

The Senator from Utah has referred to the deficiency bill which will yet be before the Senate. I think if we fix this allowance at $5 per day, where it ought to be, it might be some inducement to the committee to fix the same allowance in the deficiency bill.

Mr. WARREN and Mr. OVERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. STERLING. I yield first to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who first addressed the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say that I agree with my colleague on the Appropriations Committee, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that we have neglected too long to adjust the per diem allowance of $4 per day; but I do not agree with the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads that to make the allowance $5 in this instance will help to bring about that adjustment. I think, on the other hand, to make the allowance $4 instead of $5 per day will cause us to have help from the quarter immediately affected as well as from others; so that we will be more apt to secure a uniform provision, because the appropriation bills, of course, must pass before the end of the session.

Mr. SMOOT. All should be treated alike.

Mr. OVERMAN. Are not these inspectors paid large salaries?

Mr. STERLING. They are paid an annual salary.

Mr. OVERMAN. What salaries do they get?

Mr. STERLING. By referring to the bill I find that for grade 1 the salary is $2,800 per annum, for grade 2 the salary is $3,000 per annum, and on up to grade 6, with a salary of $4,000 per annum, and there are 15 inspectors in charge with a salary $4,500 per annum. Those are the salaries which are provided for in the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. They are getting a larger salary than are other employees.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, a per diem of $4 for these inspectors for 365 days will amount to $1,460. I am willing to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota modifies his amendment in the manner suggested by the Senator from Utah. The question now is upon the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I should like to call up an amendment which I sent to the desk a few moments ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The PRINCIPAL CLERK. On page 10, line 9, it is proposed to strike out "$3,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$3,300."

Mr. EDGE. That is simply to correct a printer's error, and in no way increases the intended salary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer as an amendment to the committee amendment two additional sections, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The PRINCIPAL CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill the following additional sections:

SEC. —. That all committees, local, State or national, and all persons or parties having any part or share in the election or in the campaign for the election of Members of Congress and all officers or officials of the Government of the United States shall publish at the end of each 10 days a financial report of the contributions received by, or for the account of, the committee, or person, or party, or candidate, directly or indirectly, with the name of each contributor and the amount of his contribution, directly or indirectly, and at the end of each campaign for the election of such Members of Congress, or officers, or officials of the Government of the United States shall publish a complete and detailed financial statement, giving the name of each contributor and the amount of his contribution, together with the amount of any deficit incurred in the campaign; and such committee, or party, shall thereafter publish at the end of each month the amounts received by it from each contributor, directly or indirectly, to make up the deficit. Such reports and financial statements shall also be opened to inspection by the public.

SEC. —. Every person, including every member of the committee, offending against the foregoing section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall upon conviction thereof be imprisoned not more than one year or fined not to exceed $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Ransdell
Ball	Dill	Jones, Wash.	Robinson
Bayard	Edge	Kendrick	Sheppard
Borah	Edwards	Keyes	Shipstead
Brookhart	Ferris	Ladd	Simmons

Cameron	George	McKinley	Stanley
Capper	Gooding	McNary	Stephens

Couzens	Heflin	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Howell	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Johnson, Calif.	Pittman	Warren
Dale	Johnson, Minn.	Ralston	Wheeler

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, does the Senator's amendment require the appointees to specify how much they paid for the offices?

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. DIAL. The Senator ought to modify his amendment and put that in. It is a good, thriving business all over the South.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the last few months have disclosed more pronouncedly than ever before, in my opinion, the necessity of the utmost publicity with reference to campaign funds. In my opinion, the real remedy for the abuse of the use of money in campaigns is that of publicity, rather than to undertake to control the matter through statutes which simply provide for punishment in case parties violating the law are arrested and convicted. In other words, I prefer to depend upon publicity for the purity of elections rather than criminal law.

I have therefore provided in this amendment that the committee having in charge the election of any candidate for office under the National Government, or any individual or party connected with his campaign, shall publish each 10 days during the campaign, a full account of all contributions, from whom received, the amount received, and so forth.

It has been suggested that it would be sufficient to make publication of the campaign funds at the close of the campaign; but, in my opinion, that would not meet the situation. The contributions ought to be known as the campaign progresses, and the information ought to be fairly had and as fully as possible before the voters who are called upon to pass on the question, as it were, in voting for candidates upon the day of the election.

I think, therefore, that the publicity ought to accompany the progress of the campaign, and as nearly as it can be made to do so as a practical proposition I desire to see that incorporated in the law.

Then I have provided further in the amendment that at the end of the campaign, if there shall be a deficit, the amount of the deficit shall be made known, and that all contributions taken for the purpose of making up the deficit shall be made public from time to time as they are taken.

I then provide, in the second section, that any committee or individual violating the first section of the amendment shall be punished by imprisonment or by fine, or by both imprisonment and fine. The amendment does not undertake to limit the amount of subscriptions which anyone may make. It does not undertake to say that any particular class shall not make contributions. It only places upon those receiving the contributions, or the party, the obligation of making known with whom they are doing business, from whom they have received their contributions, giving it the utmost publicity, and putting it in the minds of the voters in sufficient time to enable them to pass judgment upon the matter at the election.

I have tried to eliminate the evil of postponing these matters and running into a deficit by obligating the committee to publish the amount of the deficit and those who shall take care of it.

Mr. President, we have only a limited time in which to discuss this matter. I have no desire to occupy the time to the exclusion of others, and I shall not go further than simply to explain the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator may remember that four years ago the committee, of which the then Senator from Iowa, Mr. Kenyon, was the chairman, was appointed to take testimony concerning contributions made in the preconvention campaign. That inquiry developed information of very great value, and, I have no doubt, exercised an influence upon the result of the election.

There will be no contest, as it is understood, in the Republican convention this year, but doubtless there will be in the Democratic convention; and so a similar inquiry might furnish some considerable information of value, although no suggestion has been made, so far as I know, of any impropriety in the expenditures made thus far in the preconvention campaign. But, Mr. President, I hope the Senator will feel the necessity of the Senate passing some resolution looking to the appointment of a committee that will sit during the entire campaign to gather this information.

I know the course taken by the Senator will be helpful, but I am sure he will understand that it would produce nowhere near the satisfactory information that an investigation would. I hope it will not be considered as taking the place of an inquiry by the appropriate committee of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Montana as to the advisability of that. There is another measure before a subcommittee of which I have the honor to be chairman, introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], a more comprehensive and complete proposition than the one which I am now presenting. I hope to see that reported out and passed during the session, and I should be very glad to see a committee appointed. We know from observation and from experience four years ago the great value of an investigating committee sitting during the time a campaign is on. The Kenyon committee was sitting during the time the preconvention campaign of the Republican candidates was on, and I have not the slightest doubt that the publicity which arose out of that investigation changed the result at Chicago, and I therefore naturally have a friendly feeling to the suggestion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to a question, coupled with a brief statement?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator's amendment has not been printed, and no opportunity has been afforded Senators to study it. How is it proposed to enforce publicity if any political committee seeks to evade it?

Mr. BORAH. The second section provides punishment for failure to comply with the law.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the punishment?

Mr. BORAH. One year's imprisonment, or $5,000 fine, or both.

Mr. ROBINSON. So that there is apparently adequate penalty attached.

Mr. BORAH. I think so.

Mr. ROBINSON. The suggestion that full publicity respecting campaign contributions be required has value. It would penalize the candidate or the political party inviting or receiving contributions from questionable sources. It would have the effect of producing a reaction in public sentiment, which would reflect itself in election results.

We all know—and I do not express this from any partisan standpoint—that one of the great political evils of the time is the apparent hold on political parties which business interests and certain organizations seek and sometimes obtain by reason of liberal campaign contributions. Many believe that when an individual or association of individuals makes large contributions for the purpose of aiding candidates of political parties in winning the elections, they expect, and sometimes demand, and occasionally, at least, receive, consideration by the beneficiaries of their contributions which not infrequently is harmful to the general public interest. It is unquestionably an evil which ought to be dealt with, and dealt with intelligently and effectively.

One of the great difficulties, as was pointed out the other day on the occasion when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] brought a related subject before this body, is the ease with which statutory provisions affecting campaign contributions are evaded. A limitation on the amount of a contribution which anyone is permitted by statute to make is easily avoided by simply dividing up the contribution and having it recorded in the names of a number of individuals. So I am inclined to think that the most effective way of preventing corrupt practices growing out of campaign contributions is to pursue a legislative policy that is calculated to require absolute publicity respecting time. If the Senator's amendment accomplishes that result, it has very substantial value.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I note that the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho only requires a publication of the contribution. There is no provision requiring that contributions be listed and filed with some official of the Government. I suggest to the Senator that he consider the advisability of doing more than merely provide for the publication, but that he provide for the filing of the list of contributors with some department of the Government, the Clerk of the House, the Secretary of the Senate, or some other official.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to that; but I do provide that in addition to the publicity, the facts shall always be open to investigation by the public. Anybody can go and get them who wants them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I observe that.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to having the list filed, but I found some difficulty in designating with whom they should be filed, so as to give the information additional publicity to what is already provided for. But if the Senator has in mind an amendment, I would accept it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I suggest also to the Senator that I think his amendment could be perfected by requiring the committee to file a copy of the circular or circulars used, and also the names of the collectors. In the case we discussed the other night the attempts now being made to collect a large campaign fund in Massachusetts, the language of the circular was in the teeth of the law, if not in exact violation of the law, and the circulars indicated that there was an attempt being made to corral various groups of business organizations to contribute to a large campaign fund.

It seems to me that the Senator's amendment can be broadened by including a requirement for the publication of a list of the solicitors, with the contributions, and a copy of the circulars used. I think the Senator has made a very good contribution to the discussion on the subject.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether his amendment would repeal the present law. If it does not, the listing of the contributions will still be required.

Mr. BORAH. It would not repeal it.

Mr. FESS. The existing law requires a listing.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suppose the Senator from Idaho is of the same opinion now as when we discussed the matter the other night, that there is a serious question as to whether we have any law or not. The corrupt practices act was passed in 1912, and since that time a portion of it has been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in the decision in the Newberry case and the other portion of the law is probably unconstitutional, because it was passed before the adoption of the amendment providing for the election of Senators by popular vote. In other words, the corrupt practices act we have now is a law which was enacted when Members of the Senate were elected by the legislatures of the various States, and it is my opinion and that of others who have studied the question that we have no corrupt practices act which would be held constitutional by the Supreme Court at the present time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I recall that a committee was appointed to investigate the necessity of candidates for the Senate filing after the Supreme Court decision was rendered in the Newberry case, and my memory now is that the advice was that legally they were not required to do it, but the recommendation was that they should do it. The Senator from Massachusetts, having refreshed my memory upon that item, I think he has made a wise suggestion. At first I thought it was not necessary to list, because under the present law there is supposed to be a list filed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In the Newberry case the Supreme Court said that Congress had no right to regulate the matter of conducting primary elections; that whatever authority they had was limited to the election itself and not to the primary election.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have some knowledge of the requirements as to contributions under the law, and also as to the expenditures. Under the present law no responsible committee would accept any contribution from a corporation, for that is forbidden under the law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Did the Senator state that even under the present law contributions from corporations are forbidden?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand that under the present Federal law contributions from national banks and corporations organized under the general laws of the National Government are forbidden, but I do not understand that contributions by all corporations are forbidden, though in the several States there are provisions forbidding contributions by corporations. My own State has such a law, but my recollection is that the Federal law only forbids contributions from corporations organized under Federal laws.

Mr. FESS. My understanding is that no corporation, State or National, is permitted to make a contribution to a political committee. As the chairman of one of the committees, I frequently had such contributions returned, thinking they were unlawful.

I have sympathy with what the Senator from Idaho has in mind, the effect of publicity, but I have wondered whether it is not easy to evade that provision. Suppose I am conducting a campaign, and have some knowledge of the necessity of money for organization and educational purposes, and recognizing that it must be used in the early period of the campaign rather than waiting until the latter days, when it would be corruptly used, what would hinder me or a committee borrowing the money and soliciting the contributions just before the election?

Mr. BORAH. I think perhaps men with less ingenuity than the Senator from Ohio could evade to some extent almost any law; nevertheless, if that condition were presented under a provision such as this which I am now proposing, if it should become a part of the law, it might be very difficult for the gentleman to escape the jury's verdict, because it would be manifestly an attempt to evade the law by indirect methods, and in all probability the Senator would not be successful in doing it. I can not conceive of any law which might not be in some way evaded, of course; but this much is true, that if this becomes the law, every committee and every individual receiving money for campaign purposes, or to be used in connection with the election of an official, must report it. It has not any purpose other than that of enforcing absolutely publicity of the campaign funds and of the sources from which they come.

As I said a moment ago, there is a bill before a subcommittee of which I am the chairman, a more complete measure, dealing with the entire subject matter, but this amendment covers a feature that is not covered by that measure, and I think it is the surest remedy we can possibly have.

Mr. FESS. The use of money in our modern elections under the primary system I am sure has been abused, but at the same time I know that a certain amount of expenditure is absolutely inevitable, and just how to limit it to what is regular and to avoid all semblance of corruption is a big problem.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator that it is the big problem. I do not undertake here to say that certain classes of people shall not contribute nor that they shall be limited in their contributions. Under this statute if an individual candidate or party wants to assume the responsibility of collecting a large fund he or it may do so, but must take the chances with the voting public when it comes to the day of voting as to whether it will be gotten away with or not. The candidate is simply responsible to those who are electing him to office.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will recognize that under our modern primary system, with two elections in almost every State, and always two elections in congressional matters every second year, it involves a tremendous amount of expense in organization. When we use the newspapers and use the halls which must be rented and paid for when such distinguished men as the Senator from Idaho, for example, are asked to go out on the platform and make an address at any time, it can not be done on love nor good will. It costs to ride on the railroads and to live at the hotels and to rent buildings. It is inevitable. How to limit it to what is legiti-mate is our problem. The most legitimate use of it is going to be quite large, as the Senator must know.

Mr. BORAH. All these things cost and all these things are quite proper. The amendment will not interfere with any proper conduct of a campaign of that kind in that way.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator's idea of the publication monthly of the money to take care of the deficit is splendid. The deficit is supposed to have been a legitimate deficit and nobody ought to hesitate to make public what is being collected and for what purpose. I have wondered, however, whether the publication every 10 days preceding an election is workable, and whether it will get what the Senator desires.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment of the Senator from Idaho does not specify any method of publicity. It merely requires the contributions to be published and apparently leaves the plan of publication to the committee itself. If it is desired—and I take it that all Senators agree that that is the case—that a full measure of publicity shall be attached to campaign contributions, why not require political committees to furnish at the times stated the information directly to rival political organizations? For instance, why not require the Democratic political committee to furnish the Republican political committee with the amount of its contributions and the names of the contributors, so as to accomplish in a practical way the object of publicity? If we are in earnest about this matter, by giving the party which is presumed to be detrimentally affected by the contribution full information regarding it, we will invite public scrutiny of the contributions themselves. In all probability we would secure very practical results.

To illustrate, if some one thinks he is going to be benefited by the policies of the Republican Party and sees fit to contribute a very large sum to its campaign, and that fact were furnished to the Democratic political committee or to the Farmer-Labor political committee, if one is organized, it would make certain that the full benefits of publicity would accrue.

Mr. BROOKHART. Would not all of the parties go and endeavor to get contributions out of him, because the fact that he contributed would be known to each of them?

Mr. ROBINSON. There is one thing certain, that it would prove, as suggested by a Senator near me a few moments ago, a practical way of securing publicity for campaign contributions. It would make certain that the public would know who were making the campaign contributions and the amount of them and have an opportunity of looking into the motives behind them.

Now, another suggestion. The amendment requires the name——

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him a second?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator from Ohio himself has the floor.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is aware that every committee must now make a list and submit it to the Clerk of the House—I am not speaking of the Senate, but the Clerk of the House—of all the contributions received, individually listed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but there is rarely any actual publicity regarding it. In the first place, very few know of the existence of the statute. In the next place it has not operated effectively to give publicity concerning campaign contributions. But the Senator may be sure if he, as a representative of the Republican National Committee, is required to furnish to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], for instance, as a representative of the Democratic National Committee, a list of his contributors and the amounts, the people will be advised if the contributions have any sinister aspect.

Mr. FESS. He can get them at any time he calls at the office of the Clerk of the House, because they are there for public inspection.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not think that is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield, though the Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think there is any question as to the fact that one may contribute all the money he desires to the election of a President and the committee or candidate would not be required to make any return to anybody. The returns under the present Federal law apply only to contributions made for the election of Senators and Representatives. In my opinion, a committee may collect campaign contributions to the election of a President or Vice President or both, and not make any return at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I think that is true. Of course he can contribute it for one purpose and it frequently may be used for a different purpose. I do not know whether any practical method has yet been devised to prevent the evasion of the corrupt practices act, although I concede that the object is of very great importance from the standpoint of public morals and good government.

Mr. FESS. I want to make the observation that I think my friend the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken in saying that the publication of contributions must apply only to the election of Senators and Congressmen. I believe that it applies to the election of a President just as well.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Under our Constitution the election of President is by the States and not universal national suffrage. Each State chooses electors to a convention or Electoral College and these delegates elect the President. There is a serious constitutional question as to whether we can enact a Federal corrupt practice law regulating the manner in which the several States shall elect their presidential electors. I doubt if we could do it any more than for the election of a governor. If the Senator will look at the Federal statutes he will observe that there are no references to contributions for the election of a President or Vice President. Of course, it is true that the national committee of both parties have apparently recognized the Federal corrupt practices law as binding upon them and, I believe, have usually made the returns of funds collected as required.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct about that. The statute which the Senator from Ohio has in mind relates to the elections of Members of Congress. There is another suggestion I want to make.

Mr. FESS. Before I have to sit down——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I thought I had the floor. However, the question is, when we are conducting an election at which there is a candidate for President and a candidate for election to the Senate and a candidate for election to the House we do not differentiate, as I happen to know that committees feel under the force of the law the necessity of making public every contribution made to them.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not believe that is true as a matter of fact. I challenge the accuracy of that statement. I think if the facts were known or disclosed, very large or considerable sums of money have been actually used in elections in the States that have never been accounted for by the national committees, and I very much doubt whether the system of accounting which has usually been employed by the national committees themselves has been above question as to its accuracy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call to the attention of the Senator from Ohio that his time has expired under the 10-minute limit.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator for his courtesy. I ask unanimous consent that the laws, which are very brief, may be read at the desk.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not think the Senator should consume all of my 10 minutes by having the statutes read.

Mr. FESS. Then I ask unanimous consent that they be printed without reading, because I want to make certain that the situation is correctly understood.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to them being printed, but I would not like to have my time occupied by having them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Ohio is granted.

The statutes referred to are as follows:

"Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for indorsement at any general or special election, or election by the legislature of any State, as Senator in the Congress of the United States, shall, not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day for holding such primary election or nominating convention, and not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day of the general or special election at which he is seeking indorsement, and not less than 5 nor more than 10 days before the day upon which the first vote is to be taken in the two houses of the legislature before which he is a candidate for election as Senator, file with the Secretary of the Senate at Washington, D. C., a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination or election.

"Every such candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for indorsement or election at any general or special election, or for election by the legislature of any State, shall, within 15 days after such primary election or nominating convention, and within 30 days after any such general or special election, and within 30 days after the day upon which the legislature shall have elected a Senator, file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives or with the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate, or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, up to, on, and after the day of such primary election, nominating convention, general or special election, or election by the legislature, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination, indorsement, or election.

"Every such candidate shall include therein a statement of every promise or pledge made by him, or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent or to whom he has given authority to make any such promise or pledge, before the completion of any such primary election or nominating convention or general or special election or election by the legislature, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in the county, State, or Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment, for the purpose of procuring the support of such person or of any person in his candidacy, and if any such promise or pledge shall have been made the name or names, the address or addresses, and the occupation or occupations, of the person or persons to whom such promise or pledge shall have been made, shall be stated, together with a description of the position relating to which such promise or pledge has been made. In the event that no such promise or pledge has been made by such candidate, that fact shall be distinctly stated.

"No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall promise any office or position to any person, or to use his influence or to give his support to any person for any office or position for the purpose of procuring the support of such person, or of any person, in his candidacy; nor shall any candidate for Senator of the United States give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any money or thing of value to assist in procuring the nomination or election of any particular candidate for the legislature of the State in which he resides, but such candidate may, within the limitations and restrictions and subject to the requirements of this act, contribute to political committees having charge of the disbursement of campaign funds.

"No candidate for Representative in Congress or for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election, any sum, in the aggregate, in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides: Provided, That no candidate for Representative in Congress shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding $5,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election; and no candidate for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding $10,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election: Provided further, That money expended by any such candidate to meet and discharge any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of the State in which he resides, or for his necessary personal expenses, incurred for himself alone, for travel and subsistence, stationery and postage, writing or printing (other than in newspapers) and distributing letters, circulars, and posters, and for telegraph and telephone service, shall not be regarded as an expenditure within the meaning of this section, and shall not be considered any part of the sum herein fixed as the limit of expense and need not be shown in the statements herein required to be filed.

"The statements herein required to be made and filed before the general election, or the election by the legislature at which such candidate seeks election, need not contain items of which publicity is given in a previous statement, but the statement required to be made and filed after said general election or election by the legislature shall, in addition to an itemized statement of all expenses not theretofore given publicity, contain a summary of all preceding statements.

"Any person, not then a candidate for Senator of the United States, who shall have given, contributed, expended, used, or promised any money or thing of value to aid or assist in the nomination or election of any particular member of the legislature of the State in which he resides, shall, if he thereafter becomes a candidate for such office, or if he shall thereafter be elected to such office without becoming a candidate therefor, comply with all of the provisions of this section relating to candidates for such office, so far as the same may be applicable; and the statement herein required to be made, verified, and filed after such election shall contain a full, true, and itemized account of each and every gift, contribution, expenditure, and promise whenever made, in any wise relating to the nomination or election of members of the legislature of said State, or in any wise connected with or pertaining to his nomination and election of which publicity is not given in a previous statement.

"Every statement herein required shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the candidate, taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths under the laws of the State in which he is a candidate, and shall be sworn to or affirmed by the candidate in the district in which he is a candidate for Representative, or the State in which he is a candidate for Senator in the Congress of the United States: Provided, That if at the time of such primary election, nominating convention, general or special election, or election by the State legislature said candidate shall be in attendance upon either House of Congress as a Member thereof, he may at his election verify such statements before any officer authorized to administer oaths in the District of Columbia: Provided further, That the depositing of any such statement in a regular post office, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives or to the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, duly stamped and registered within the time required herein shall be deemed a sufficient filing of any such statement under any of the provisions of this act.

"This act shall not be construed to annul or vitiate the laws of any State not directly in conflict herewith relating to the nomination or election of candidates for the offices herein named, or to exempt any such candidate from complying with such State laws."

An act (H. R. 26278) amending paragraph 10 of section 8 of an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," approved June 25, 1910, as amended by section 2 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected' and extending the same to candidates for nomination and election to the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States and limiting the amount of campaign expenses," approved August 19, 1911

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 10 of section 8 of an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," approved June 25, 1910, as amended by section 2 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected,' and extending the same to candidates for nomination and election to the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States and limiting the amount of campaign expenses," approved August 19, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Every statement herein required shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the candidate, taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths; and the depositing of any such statement in a regular post office, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or to the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, duly stamped and registered, within the time required herein, shall be deemed a sufficient filing of any such statement under any of the provisions of this act."

Approved, August 23, 1912.

[Public, No. 222, Sixty-fifth Congress]

An act (S. 3438) to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall promise, offer, or give, or cause to be promised, offered, or given, any money or other thing of value, or shall make or tender any contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value to any person, either to vote or withhold his vote or to vote for or against any candidate, or whoever solicits, accepts, or receives any money or other thing of value in consideration of his vote for or against any candidate for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress at any primary or general or special election, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Approved, October 16, 1918.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho requires publicity as to the names of contributors. That information would not be adequate and it ought to be accompanied with a requirement as to residence and official position, if any, of the contributor. I shall move at the proper time an amendment to that effect, but let me now point it out for the consideration of the Senator from Idaho and perhaps he will accept it.

In one State that I know of every postmaster who has been selected during the last three years has been required—get the word now, "required"—in violation of the spirit of the law by a political committee to make contribution to the campaign fund of the political organization with which he is affiliated.

Mr. CARAWAY. And he must do that before he gets his job.

Mr. ROBINSON. And if he refuses to do it after he has been promised the post office, in a number of instances he has been denied the appointment. That, Mr. President, is one of the worst of abuses. That applies to the appointment of postmasters, and it has not been confined to postmasters alone, but every political appointee has been required to make contributions in advance of receiving appointment to office. Some have been assessed a fixed sum according to the value of their office, and a percentage of the estimated earnings of the office or the salary has been extorted from them in consideration of receiving the office.

Mr. STERLING. That is true, irrespective of what party is in power.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not understand that that is the case. I am not speaking now from a partisan standpoint. I did not anticipate that anyone would raise a partisan issue because this subject is of very great importance to the public as a whole. It relates to the integrity of the Government. At various times these contributions have been solicited by some one who is forbidden by law to solicit campaign contributions. I could give many instances, and my colleague can do the same thing, in one State where postmasters now in office were informed in advance of appointment that they were expected to pay a certain amount.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CARAWAY. I merely wish to call the attention of my colleague to one case where a man who had been promised the office of postmaster neglected to make his contribution. He was in a barber shop getting shaved one Saturday afternoon, and the collector went in there and made him quit in the midst of that operation and go out and raise the money. He said if he did not he was going to let another man have the office. As I understand it, he went out with half his whiskers off.

Mr. ROBINSON. This practice is general and it is wrong, Mr. President. If it has been indulged in by both political parties or organizations, it ought to be stopped and prevented, if it be in the power of those who legislate to accomplish that end.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio with pleasure.

Mr. FESS. Is it not a fact that it is against the law for a postmaster to solicit any contributions?

Mr. ROBINSON. I made that statement a moment ago.

Mr. FESS. I beg pardon.

Mr. ROBINSON. Not only is it contrary to law to solicit contributions from postmasters, but the party in interest whom I have in mind who made the solicitation was expressly forbidden by law to solicit campaign contributions because of an official position which he held; but if we shall put into the amendment of the Senator from Idaho a provision requiring to be given not only the name of the contributor but also his residence and the official position that he occupies, so that it shall be made plain, for instance, that the contributor is John Smith, postmaster at Birmingham, Ala., we shall get information that is of value.

Of course there are methods of evading even such provisions as that which I am suggesting. They will occur to those who are in the habit of applying evasive processes, but——

Mr. KENDRICK rose.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall yield to the Senator from Wyoming in just one moment.

But it would, in my opinion, add to the value of the amendment to require that the residence of the contributor and his official position, if he holds one, be also stated, so that the public could know the sources of campaign contributions and the relationship of the contributors to the committees to which they make contributions. Now I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KENDRICK. In view of the fact that the Senator from Arkansas has stated that these collections are often made in advance, I wonder if the contributor would be described in that event as the "would-be postmaster"?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I apprehend, though, that if he made a contribution and it subsequently appeared that he received an office, it would at least be inferential that his contribution did not prevent him from obtaining official recognition, not to say that it assisted him in doing so. The publicity which would result would be of increased value.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. What would the Senator do in the kind of case where a trade is made for an office, and a sum of money is paid, and the negotiations are instituted for additional payments, and the statement is made that nothing can be done unless more is paid? There are cases of that kind.

Mr. ROBINSON. Perhaps the question of public policy would arise if an action were brought for the breach of such a contract. Some one has humorously suggested that a suit for "specific performance" might be instituted, all of which goes to show the difficulty in dealing with this subject effectively so as to prevent the evasions of the statute.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I have some knowledge of rumors, which perhaps could be proven, along the line indicated by the Senator from Arkansas and by my colleague, but, as the matter appears to me, if it be unlawful for the postmasters to contribute under certain circumstances and for others to solicit, if they are already performing an unlawful act, would they not find a means to cover up their practices?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; the contributions might be taken from the wife of the postmaster.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Or, for further instance, the grandmother of the postmaster, or the niece of the postmaster.

Mr. SMITH. They might take contributions from the postmaster himself. What I was thinking about was they might find some other individual in the community who would make the collections and return them. I should like to see the law so amended that we might find out the source of the contribution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Arkansas on the amendment has expired.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the object sought to be attained by this amendment, but the discussion which has followed it and the various suggestions which have been made, it seems to me, demonstrate very conclusively that the amendment now before the Senate is not perfected to the extent that it could be perfected if more time and consideration were given to it, and that it should not be attached to the pending bill.

Some reference has been made to the beneficial effects of a committee appointed four years ago to investigate contributions and expenditures of candidates for the Presidency. I happened to be a member of that committee, and I am glad to hear expressions to the effect that the committee accomplished good; I myself likewise think it had such a result. I think the object sought to be covered by the amendment is very important if we are going to attempt to legislate on the question of corrupt practices, but certainly it does not belong to a postal salary increase bill. It is all right as the subject for an hour or so of discussion, or many hours discussion, because of its importance, which no one minimizes; but the facts are the parliamentary situation which would naturally result if this amendment were adopted and attached to the pending bill would hardly be advantageous to the bill itself. The bill, I assume, will have to go to conference, inasmuch as the House considered and passed quite a different postal salary measure than that reported to the Senate, and the addition of the proposed amendment would put the conferees of the two Houses in the position of considering the very involved subject of corrupt practices as well as the meritorious increases in the salaries of the post-office employees. While in full sympathy with a proper, strong, and sound amendment or a new statute covering this most important question, I certainly do not think it should be made a part of the postal salary increase bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am in very hearty sympathy with the proposal of the Senator from Idaho to have publicity of campaign contributions. I think that the amendment ought to be adopted, and I do not think that the Senator from New Jersey is correct in stating that it has no place on this bill. I remember well after I became a Member of the House of Representatives a number of years ago that on the post office appropriation bill were enacted some of the best pieces of legislation that have ever been passed by Congress. This amendment is in order on this bill; the session is growing very late; and if we are going to have publicity of campaign contributions something must be done at a very early date.

I was delighted to hear the Senator from Idaho, who is chairman of the subcommittee considering a bill which I introduced some time ago limiting campaign contributions, say that he thought the committee would report that bill within a few days. I am gratified to hear that; and I hope the bill may be reported to the Senate and that it may be enacted into law.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McKINLEY. The population of the State of Idaho is about 420,000 and of the State of New York about 11,000,000. The bill of the Senator from Tennessee provides that the same amount may be expended for campaign purposes in New York as may be expended in Idaho. Does the Senator think that is fair?

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps not; but if the committee that has it in charge or the Senator from Illinois can show any element of unfairness about it, I have no pride of authorship in the bill at all, and I will be glad to accept an amendment which will make it fair and just to all the States of the Union as well as those who may be concerned.

The truth is, Mr. President, that in the last national campaign one of the political parties expended a gross amount of $9,700,000, and another one of the political parties spent $2,500,000. Both of those sums are tremendously in excess of what any political party ought to spend in an election. The proposal which I have submitted to the Senate limits the amount that may be expended by a political party in the national campaign to $1,000,000. I think that is enough. If we are going to have honesty in elections and honesty in Government, some method of limiting campaign contributions ought to be devised and put into effect.

I am not going to discuss this afternoon the proposal which I have submitted to the Senate; but I do wish to say that publicity such as is proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Idaho will be one of the most potent factors in producing honesty in campaign expenditures. It will, to a tremendous degree, reduce the amount spent corruptly, and it should be adopted. We ought not to take any chances on it. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will withdraw his objection to the amendment, for we ought to do something in this regard. If the plan of those on both sides of the Chamber shall mature, we have only about two weeks in which to pass this much-needed legislation. This is the year of the presidential election and we ought to pass this legislation. I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho will be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I read over the amendment of the Senator from Idaho very hurriedly, but was immediately called out of the Chamber and did not have the pleasure of hearing the Senator from Idaho explain the details of the amendment. I asked him if it applied to primary elections and he replied that it did not. It seems to me, Mr. President, if we are going to have any publicity of campaign contributions at all, that publicity ought to apply all along the line.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator understands that in the Newberry case the Supreme Court of the United States, whose decisions are final and binding on us, held that Congress has no authority under our Constitution to regulate primary elections.

Mr. SMOOT. I knew of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Newberry case, but I thought, notwithstanding that decision, a measure could be drawn in some other form than that in which the previous act was drawn and presented to the Supreme Court that would be constitutional. If expenditures made in a primary election are not to be made public to the people of the United States, what is the use of having the publication merely of the expenditures in the elections themselves? Practically everywhere in the South the primary is equivalent to the election; the battle is fought in the primary; and that is where the money is expended, and not in the election at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not correct in my State, and I happen to be from a Southern State. We have a right hot fight there occasionally in the election following the primary.

Mr. SMOOT. There may be a very few spots in Tennessee and perhaps in Kentucky where there is money spent in the election as well as in the primary.

Mr. McKELLAR. I greatly regret to have to make the humiliating statement that considerable money was spent in Tennessee by the Republicans in the last national election. So the Senator from Utah is not correct in his statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I said there were probably a few spots in Tennessee and also in Kentucky where money is expended in election campaigns because of the fact that there is a real election in those States, but the Senator knows that in all the other Southern States the primary is equivalent to the election.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not so in my State.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know, of course, how much money may be spent in North Carolina, but very little, I imagine, including both the Republican and the Democratic Parties.

Mr. OVERMAN. Two hundred thousand Republican votes are cast in the State.

Mr. SMOOT. But it is a Democratic State. When the Senator is nominated in the primary of North Carolina he knows he is as good as elected. Perhaps it may happen once in a lifetime, by some accident, that the primary does not settle the election, but such instances are very rare.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that if this amendment shall be adopted, a third of the United States will not be affected in any way, shape, or form by it. If some kind of a law could be passed so worded as to require the publication of expenses in both primary and election campaigns it would be much fairer to all political parties.

I do not know whether that can be done or not, and I do not know whether the Senator from Idaho has undertaken to work out a plan along that line, or whether it would be constitutional; but no one can say that a comparison between the amount of money expended by the Republican Party and the amount of money expended by the Democratic Party in connection with the election of a President of the United States is a fair comparison.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; it always takes more to elect a Republican.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Republicans have to pay the expenses of the delegates from the South.

Mr. CARAWAY. And there is a reason for that.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, certainly; the Senator can give his reasons and so can I. I have already stated one of the reasons, and that is that nobody knows what is expended in the primaries, and that is where the election is made in the Southern States. If some law that would be constitutional could be passed to cover that, I think it ought to be done.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Utah takes his seat let me say that surely our existing law in regard to expenditures covers primaries as well as elections. There is a great deal of money spent in primaries, and there ought to be returns from primaries everywhere in the country just the same as from elections.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator; and as far as the State of Utah is concerned it does not make any difference whether a President is running on the ticket or is being voted for or not. Every dollar of contributions is made public, and the source from which it is received. The fact that somebody has given $100 or $200 toward electing a certain President does not bar the committee in the State of Utah from making that contribution public, and it is always done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, let me say at the outset that I am very much in favor of the general tenor of this amendment; but I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and other Senators who take an interest in it to a situation which has never yet been covered by a Federal statute.

Our statute as it reads to-day, as I recollect it, for example, provides a limitation upon the amount of money which may be spent to secure an election, and there are provisions of State laws which limit the amount of money which may be spent by a political committee in furtherance of the election of a candidate; but very few States have any law which limits the amount of money which can be spent in opposition to a candidate, and time and time again groups of people organize themselves for the purpose not of advancing the election of a candidate but of defeating a certain candidate. The thing has grown into an abuse, and considerably so because by that device all limitation is avoided.

Perhaps Senators will forgive me the relation of a personal experience. The last time I was a candidate for office a certain organization which under the provisions of the corrupt practices act, we will say, of the State of New York did not fall within the definition of a political committee, by its own announcement flooded the State of New York with 10,000,000 circulars not favoring any person for a certain office, but denouncing a certain person and demanding his defeat, and no obligation rested upon them to make any accounting for the money spent for the 10,000,000 circulars or for any other kind of expenditure. It is the easiest thing in the world to beat this game by those tactics.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what amendment does the Senator suggest?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would express the idea that not only shall these reports be made for contributions received in furtherance of a candidacy but for contributions received in opposition to a candidacy.

Mr. BORAH. I think the language of the amendment at present will cover that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not certain about that.

Mr. BORAH. If it does not, I shall be glad to change it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It reads:

That all committees—

And the committee is not defined—

local, State, or National, and all persons or parties—

I am not clear as to whether "persons or parties" would cover it or not—having any part or share in the election or in the campaign for the election of Members of Congress—

These people will say that they are taking no part in electing a Member of Congress. They will say that they are simply taking part in preventing the election of a Congressman, and that is what they do.

Mr. BORAH. I shall be very glad to change the amendment so as to cover the matter. The words "having any part or share in the election" would cover it, but if the Senator wants it made fuller I shall be glad to make it so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I find myself in hearty sympathy with the idea suggested by the Senator from New York. Why not have the provision apply to any party or group of people or organization that attempts to influence public opinion?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the sort of language that should be inserted in a corrupt practices act.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, that is the language of the present law. The exact words are "to influence the result."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator will find that it says "in furtherance of a candidacy."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The first paragraph of the general law, passed June 10, 1910—it has been somewhat amended since—says:

That the term "political committee" under the provisions of this act shall include the national committees of all political parties and the national congressional campaign committees of all political parties and all committees, associations, or organizations, which shall, in two or more States——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Two or more States!

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It has to be committees influencing elections in two or more States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There you fall down.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I continue reading:

Which shall in two or more States influence the result or attempt to influence the result of an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but the "two or more States" vitiates the whole thing.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I agree the Federal authority is limited. I believe the best way to reach the election abuses is through State legislation, because it is doubtful if you can pass a Federal law unless it applies to committees interested in elections being held in more than one State. You have to have it apply to political committees taking part in the election in two or more States. Of course, we can pass corrupt practices laws that apply to the elections of Senators and Representatives only.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then this amendment is not in order. This amendment does not contain the implication that it shall apply only to persons operating in two or more States.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It applies to organizations or committees that are receiving contributions for the election of Federal officials. It attempts to get a public record of all contributions. It certainly will be construed by the public as requiring public information from national political organizations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, for the purpose of clarification, may I ask the Senator from Idaho about this particular phrase:

The amendment says that these committees—

Shall publish at the end of each 10 days a financial report.

When does the first 10 days start?

Mr. BORAH. It would start as soon as the committee was organized.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but persons do not have to be organized. When do they start?

Mr. BORAH. They would necessarily have to start 10 days after they began to do business for a candidate.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] a question. In the case cited by the Senator from New York, where he was a candidate for the Senate, and money was spent to secure his defeat, in the event those contributions were made by citizens of New York to committees organized within the State of New York, does the Senator's amendment reach them?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; if they have to do with the election of a Federal officer.

Mr. BROUSSARD. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to ask a question, does this amendment cover organizations that are not engaged in the election of Members of the Senate and of the House?

Mr. BORAH. It covers, in my opinion, all that we can cover under the decision in the Newberry case. It covers the election of all Federal officials. It does not cover, of course, the election of State officials nor can it do so.

Mr. BROUSSARD. No; I think the Senator misunderstood my question. I am asking whether this amendment would cover the case stated by the Senator from New York, where an organization becomes interested in the defeat of a candidate. It is not urging any candidacy, nor is it a political party.

Mr. BORAH. This does not limit it. It refers to any committee—it does not have to be a political committee—or any individual:

That all committees—local, State, or National—and all persons or parties having any part or share in the election or in the campaign for the election——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have never seen the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I think that language covers it, but I should be very glad to have fuller language.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are very adroit people, and I imagine they would contend that taking part in the election of a Member of Congress meant furthering the election of a Member of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. They could not contend that, because this amendment says "taking part in the election," and these people certainly are taking part in the election.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have had a little experience with them in New York, because they attempted to declare themselves out from under the New York State corrupt practices act, and they had to be haled into court, and the decision is now, I think, still waited for as to whether or not they were a political committee or a group of persons engaged in a political activity under the meaning of the New York statute. The thing has grown up into a very great abuse; and there is more spending of money in that way these days, I believe, on the quiet, where it can not be gotten after, than in many a legitimate channel of political expenditure.

Mr. BORAH. If they were opposing a candidate, they could not successfully contend that they were not taking part in his election.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And may I add that they make no returns under the present statutes.

Mr. BORAH. I should want to cover that situation. I think I have, but if I have not I should be glad to have the proper amendment suggested.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, does not the Senator realize, in view of these suggestions, which are intended to be very helpful, that his amendment—which has not even been printed, and can not be familiar to the Senators—needs further consideration, rather than being tacked on to a bill for conference consideration?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not realize that. Others may, but I have given considerable time to the amendment, and I think it covers what is desired.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator probably has.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senate feels as the Senator indicates, they can vote down the amendment.

I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has an amendment to offer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think the field in which the National Government can legislate on this subject is somewhat limited. It is my opinion that the State governments have very nearly absolute control over the manner of electing presidential electors, Senators, and Members of the House of Representatives. I think it is largely, if not solely, a State function. Most of the States have passed corrupt practices acts dealing with the question, but these laws are not uniform and apparently are rarely enforced.

But the National Government has attempted to regulate the manner in which money shall be raised and spent for the electing of Senators and of Members of the House of Representatives. These laws are chaotic, if not unconstitutional, and it is a serious question whether we now have any law that the courts would uphold.

I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will certainly do no harm, and should do a great deal of good. It will be notice to political organizations on the eve of a presidential election that Congress desires the public to know the amount of money that is contributed for the election of officers of the Federal Government, and who is contributing it. I believe great good will result from the enactment of this amendment at the present time, especially in view of the uncertainty of the present law. It will be a clear pronouncement by Congress that publicity is expected and required in the use of money in national campaigns.

In order that the amendment may be strengthened somewhat, I suggest that in the last line of section 1, after the word "statements," the following words be added—together with copies of circulars used in soliciting contributions and the names of all solicitors of campaign funds, shall be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate, and—

So that the last sentence of the section shall read:

Such reports and financial statements, together with copies of circulars used in soliciting contributions and the names of all solicitors of campaign funds, shall be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate, and shall be opened to inspection by the public.

Mr. BORAH. I accept the amendment.

Mr. FESS. I notice the wording is "together with copies of circulars used in soliciting contributions." Suppose a committee addresses a personal letter to the list of contributors they might have in the office. The letter is personal, stating the general situation, and so on. There may be one letter, followed by a second in a week or two weeks, and followed by a third, and the third letter would be the one that would ask for the contribution. How would this cover that?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This would not require the filing of all letters, only those that solicited contributions. The general amendment aims to give publicity to the names of all contributors, and the amounts which they contribute. I suggest that the circulars sent forth for the purpose of soliciting funds be also published, together with the names of all individuals authorized to solicit campaign funds.

Mr. FESS. Would that mean that every letter sent out requesting contributions should be published?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Every committee that collects funds must make it known that they have collected funds, from whom they have collected, and the amounts. I add, as an amendment, that the appeal circulars which committees send out shall be opened to public inspection. The courts would not experience difficulty in determining the difference between a letter that solicited funds and other political literature.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to remind the Senate that it has agreed that no Senator shall speak more than once upon any amendment.

The Senator from Idaho has accepted the modification proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and the question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, as modified.

Mr. ROBINSON. Pending that, I proposed an amendment, which was discussed some minutes ago, on line 7, after the word "name," to insert a comma and the words "residence, and official position, if any."

Mr. BORAH. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I am informed that if present he would vote as I shall vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], but I have been informed that if present he would vote as I shall vote on this question, and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BAYARD. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and in his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and vote "yea."

Mr. PITTMAN. The senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. If the Senator from Florida were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

I am informed, however, that on this vote all the Senators whose pairs I have announced would vote "yea," if present.

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 0, as follows:

So Mr. BORAH's amendment, as modified, to the amendment of the committee was agreed to, as follows:

SEC. —. That all committees, local, State, or National, and all persons or parties having any part or share in the election or in the campaign for the election of Members of Congress and all officers or officials of the Government of the United States shall publish at the end of each 10 days a financial report of the contributions received by or for the account of the committee, or person, or party, or candidate, directly or indirectly, with the name, residence, and official position, if any, of each contributor and the amount of his contribution, directly or indirectly, and at the end of each campaign for the election of such Members of Congress or officers or officials of the Government of the United States shall publish a complete and detailed financial statement, giving the name of each contributor and the amount of his contribution, together with the amount of any deficit incurred in the campaign, and such committee or party shall thereafter publish at the end of each month the amounts received by it from each contributor, directly or indirectly, to make up the deficit. Such reports and financial statements, together with copies of circulars used in soliciting contributions and the names of all solicitors of campaign funds, shall be filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate, and shall also be opened to inspection by the public.

SEC. —. Every person, including every member of the committee, offending against the foregoing section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall upon conviction thereof be imprisoned not more than one year or fined not to exceed $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to the substitute as amended.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am not sure of the parliamentary situation at this moment. Are we considering a substitute for the entire bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the substitute for the bill as amended.

Mr. LODGE. I move to strike out, on line 22, page 27, beginning with the word "Provided," the following:

Provided further, That watchmen, messengers, and laborers, after three years in the Postal Service as regular employees, shall be eligible for promotion to first-grade clerical and carrier positions upon passing a noncompetitive examination on recommendation of the Post Office Department.

All the men and women in the first grade clerical and carrier positions have reached their places by the competitive examination system. They have all been in the classified service. This is a proposal to take watchmen, messengers, and laborers after three years, who have never passed any of the examinations required of the higher grades, and promote them to those higher grades with only a noncompetitive examination, which is no examination at all.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. EDGE. So far as I am concerned, I am entirely ready to accept the amendment. It was suggested by the department and accepted by the committee simply because of the provision that there must be more or less qualification and the applicant must be recommended by the Post Office Department. I am rather inclined to agree with the argument presented by the Senator and am entirely satisfied with his suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator in charge of the bill accepts it, I have nothing further to say. I do not care to take time except to point out that the effect of it would be to shake and impair the entire organized service as it exists to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The READING CLERK. On page 27, line 23, after the numeral "1" and the colon, strike out the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That watchmen, messengers, and laborers, after three years in the Postal Service as regular employees, shall be eligible for promotion to first-grade clerical and carrier positions upon passing a noncompetitive examination on recommendation of the Post Office Department; and,

Mr. ROBINSON. I inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill whether the provision which the Senator from Massachusetts seeks to strike out was recommended by the Post Office Department?

Mr. EDGE. I made that statement a moment ago. It was recommended by the Post Office Department, and for that reason was accepted by the committee, with some question, however. I personally questioned it seriously.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the committee look into the purpose and effect of the provision or did the committee just accept it merely because it was recommended by the Post Office Department?

Mr. EDGE. As I recall, there was no particular statement in connection with it. The Post Office Department prepared a bill which they submitted in its entirety to the committee. That bill contained many features different from the bill now before the Senate. This was one of them. I do not recall any particular discussion about it.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. I might say as a member of the joint committee that this particular item was under discussion by members of the joint committee and there was a difference of opinion. It was resolved in favor of the proposed permission for the reason that it had been recommended by the Post Office Department. The thought of the Post Office Department was that any employees who had given three years' satisfactory service, although not in a clerical grade, might be granted a preference when they were capable of passing an examination which the Post Office Department would prescribe. It would be merely an admission to the entrance grade.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would permit the admission to clerical positions and carrier positions of any number of persons whom the Post Office Department might desire to admit, without any competitive examination whatever.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. PHIPPS. After examination and recommendation of the department.

Mr. ROBINSON. The examination would be noncompetitive, and that means that anyone might be admitted whom the Post Office Department saw fit to admit.

Mr. LODGE. It turns it into an examination which would amount to nothing. Anybody could be let in whom the Post Office Department chose to take in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in connection with the debate on the pending measure, the postal employees' salaries bill, and lest no opportunity to speak is presented later, I ask that a statement made by me, together with a letter printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on December 15 last, and also editorials ably and convincingly supporting the bill from the Christian Science Monitor and the Boston Daily Globe may be printed in the RECORD. There appears to be such general approval by the press and the public of an increased salary for postal employees that prolonged debate seems unnecessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

POSTAL EMPLOYEES' SALARIES

SPEECH OF HON. DAVID I. WALSH, OF MASSACHUSETTS, IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, DECEMBER 15, 1923

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I doubt if the Members of Congress or the general public realize the threatening demoralization of the Postal Service of the country by reason of the inadequate salaries paid our postal employees. Only a fine spirit of public service and the conviction that Congress would soon readjust the present niggardly salaries has prevented a condition developing which would seriously cripple the Postal Service.

As it is, the labor turnover in the clerical branch of this service is larger than in any other branch of the Government.

The postal carrier has to face all kinds of weather, bear the consciousness of being charged with an important trust, and endure the physical strain of carrying a heavy pack while traveling his route day after day year in and year out. For all this the Postal Service pays a minimum of $26.92 and a maximum of $34.61 per week after three years. These salaries make it increasingly difficult to recruit capable postal employees. We can not afford to let the Postal Service deteriorate, for delay, inaccuracy, and carelessness in the service are ruinous.

The very efficient postmaster of Boston, Mr. Roland M. Baker, recently made an investigation as to the cost of living for a postal employee with a small family—not over four persons. The result of that investigation shows that the monthly expenditures amounted to $203, while the maximum salary is $150 per month. I ask, Mr. President, that the postmaster's letter and statement showing the result of his investigation be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and treated in the nature of a petition. It is very brief but illuminating.

There being no objection, the letter and accompanying table were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER,
Boston, Mass., December 4, 1923.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I inclose you an itemized expense account which I am sure will interest you as being the minimum amount a month, and also per annum, on which a postal employee with a small family of not over four persons (many of them have families greater than this) can live in a normal, healthy, self-respecting manner in the Boston postal district to-day.

I have investigated the matter as carefully as I possibly can and am personally quite shocked at the amount which I find, as a result of the investigation, is necessary for the above purpose.

Will you kindly look over the items or, perhaps better still, have some one investigate the matter; and if you find same is based upon facts, interest yourself, which I am sure you will be only too glad to do, in a manner that we trust will result in correcting the situation.

Unless the employees of the Government are paid an adequate compensation it will be found an impossibility to secure a satisfactory type of individual for entrance into this service. I know you will agree with me that the situation calls for immediate correction, and I am sure that you will take great satisfaction in looking into the matter, as I say, not only in the interest of the employees themselves but in the interest of the service, both of which spell, in my own opinion, the protection of the best interests of the Government of the United States and its people.

Faithfully yours,

ROLAND M. BAKER, Postmaster.

THE POSTAL WORKER AND HIS JOB

Evidence has been presented which has convinced the people of the United States that an unnecessary hardship is being inflicted upon the great mass of Government postal employees who bear the burdens of that service. So concerned have the people been over appalling expenditures in other departments that they have striven penuriously, but perhaps unconsciously, to stop the scanty dripping from the Postal Service spigot. There, it has been assumed, real economies might be practiced. But in the effort to economize they have perpetrated a great wrong upon thousands of faithful workers and their dependent families. They have willingly accepted the benefits of the far-reaching Parcel Post System which can not be economically maintained at the rates established, cheerfully agreeing that whatever deficit might exist should be made up from appropriations of the public funds. But they have thus far denied to the clerks and carriers, who have brought this service to the point of practical perfection, a decent living wage.

The public, standing in the place of an employer, is estopped in the present instance from falling back upon the abused theory that if the worker doesn't like his job or the pay offered he should surrender his place to another. Those employed in the Postal Service, whether in clerical positions or in the carrier force, have passed through long and somewhat tedious periods of apprenticeship and training. They are better qualified to do the work assigned them than others who have been trained along different lines, no matter what their general capabilities. These men and women are likewise under the civil-service rule and because of this are entitled to adequate protection in return for more or less highly specialized service rendered.

Specious and vain promises have been made to these employees in behalf of the Government. In 1920 an effort was made in Congress to authorize the reclassification of the salaries paid in the Postal Service. Action was deferred at that time because of the possibility that living costs were about to be materially reduced. That hope was not realized, and as a result some 350,000 servants of the public are still compelled to work for less than a fair living wage. It is shown conclusively by figures presented that the salaries paid to clerks and carriers, which range from $1,400 to $1,800 a year and which average in the neighborhood of $31 a week, are inadequate for the simplest needs of a family in the United States.

Concerted effort is being made throughout the country to enlist official and popular support for a measure now pending in Congress, known as the Kelly-Edge bill, providing for the reclassifying of all salaries paid in the Post Office Department. This reclassification will call for a larger postal appropriation, but this the people should be only too willing to grant. It is not expected that the Postal Service will return a profit, and those who calmly accept the benefits offered and perpetuated through generous subsidies should quickly agree that those who bear the ceaseless burdens incident to such a public service are entitled to an adequate living wage.

[From the Boston Daily Globe, Friday, February 8, 1924]

THE MAILMAN

There must be something wrong with a business where regular employees of high standing find themselves obliged to seek odd jobs here and there in order to make both ends meet. Serving two masters is at best difficult, and holding two jobs belongs in the same class. When an enormous concern employing 330,000 men and women pays so little for a day's work that about a quarter of the help are ready to usher at prize fights, sell from door to door, play in orchestras, or do about anything that promises an extra dollar, it might seem that popular resentment would be aroused. Unfortunately this is not yet the case. Perhaps the reason that the public is slow to indignation is that the public owns the concern.

The business in question is the United States Postal Service, where pay has remained the same for the past four years. The inevitable has happened to the working force. Men who took the civil-service examinations years ago with the idea of remaining in the service for life have become discouraged and accepted opportunities in other lines. The labor turnover has risen to an average of 20 per cent a year for the entire country. In Detroit jobs in the post office look so poor as compared with jobs outside that it has been 14 months since an examination has been held for clerks or carriers. Instead of interviewing applicants the Detroit post office calls up the employment bureaus from time to time and asks that men "willing to do anything" be sent around. There are some cities where the postmaster is quick to send out recruiting scouts when he hears of an industrial strike. In that way he can obtain temporary help until the strike is settled and the strikers go back. The postmaster must then run short handed until another strike.

The present maximum for carriers and clerks, who begin at $1,400 a year, is $1,800. This means that the man who brings your mail, if he has been a regular in the service for four years, receives, after he has made his payment to the retiring fund, a weekly wage of $33.75. Postmaster Baker, of Boston, has been asking the men in his office how much it actually costs a family of four—father, mother, and two children—to live. The average of the replies he has received works out to $46.86 a week. This means that such a family must find $13.11 each week somewhere outside of the service. That is why many a clerk or carrier is perpetually on the lookout for part-time work.

Naturally the service suffers. In order to do his Government task well a carrier must be master of an 800-page book of regulations. He must keep a log of removal addresses, must hold in his memory several thousand names. He is also a collection agency for C. O. D. packages, and carries a book in which mail may be registered. So exacting a position requires a man of considerable ability. The trouble with the service is that it is not now attracting men of the caliber absolutely necessary for efficiency. The result is poor service. That is one reason why letters go astray and are delivered late. That is why the postmaster finds it so often necessary to shift experienced men from one route to another and put unqualified substitutes in the vacant places.

In several bills now before Congress a remedy is sought for this intolerable situation. A measure reported to the House sets a new maximum of $2,400, which works out to $46.15 a week. If some such relief as this is granted, the post office will take on new life. The time may come when the curve which shows the cost of living will bend downward again, but it has been up for a number of years, and there seems no present prospect of a great reduction. It is quite evident that the employees of the post office have decided not to wait for it.

The Postal Service can not be mechanical. No machine has ever been invented, or ever will be, which will read the addresses on letters and parcels. Human brains and faithfulness are required all through it. Emphatically it is a human service. For that reason the men and women who compose it must be treated with fairness. They can not live on dignity, and to oblige them to seek extra money elsewhere after doing exacting tasks for Uncle Sam for eight hours is sheer folly. The quality of the service can only be maintained if the conditions are made sufficiently attractive to draw into it the type of human ability that it must have.

The public, the owner of the post office, is also its patron. If, as owner, it permits starvation pay it must expect, as patron, to receive indifferent service. The people of this country do not want to be in the position of skin-flint employers. They wish and need the best postal system in the world. As they learn the truth they will become hearty supporters of a square deal for the gray uniforms.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Mr. LODGE. I have another amendment that I desire to offer, but I would rather not offer it now unless the Senator expects to finish the bill to-night.

Mr. EDGE. I would like to finish the bill to-night, but it has been brought to my attention that some Senators interpreted the unanimous-consent agreement, which reads "not later than 1 o'clock," to mean that we would not vote until to-morrow. With that understanding, if any Senator so interpreting it has left the Chamber, of course, I would not ask for a vote before that hour.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was distinctly understood that the vote would not be taken to-day. Some Senators went away with the understanding that they would return to-morrow in time to vote at 1 o'clock.

Mr. EDGE. I was going to state that if the Senator had permitted me to do so. Under the circumstances I am not going to ask for a vote until to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. Then I will allow my other amendment to go over until to-morrow, and shall offer it then.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is there objection to taking a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. EDGE. If there are no further amendments and no further discussion on the bill, I would be very glad to make a motion that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, unless there is some reason for meeting an hour earlier.

Mr. PHIPPS. It was my desire to see if we could not take up the District of Columbia appropriation bill to-night, if the Senator from New Jersey is willing to lay aside the postal salaries bill. I would like to get started on the District appropriation bill, because it is an important one and will probably require quite a little time in conference.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that bill is to be taken up, I think we should have the absence of a quorum suggested, as Senators are out of the Chamber who are very much interested in the District appropriation bill.

Mr. PHIPPS. There has been such a recent call that I thought perhaps that might not be necessary. I did not intend to go very far with the bill to-night.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts will take any time we ought to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning instead of 12.

Mr. EDGE. Very well. At this time I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business for the day it shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. EDGE. If it is the desire of the Senator from Colorado to take up the District of Columbia appropriation bill, I will gladly ask to have the unfinished business laid aside temporarily.

Mr. PHIPPS. I will defer my request for consideration of the District appropriation bill until a later time.

PROTECTION OF ALASKAN FISHERIES

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have just sent for the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who is absent from the Chamber. I have been hoping to be able to call up the Alaskan fisheries bill for some little time. The Senator from Utah wants to take a little time in discussing it. I do not think he has any objection to the bill, and I thought if I could get him here I might probably take up the bill and pass it inside of half an hour or such a matter. I do not want to take it up in his absence.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is Calendar No. 472, the bill (H. R. 8143) for the protection of the fisheries of Alaska, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator might have the bill read.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; we might have the bill read, and possibly the Senator from Utah will be here by that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8143. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do that with the understanding that if I can not get the Senator from Utah here this evening I shall not ask for the passage of the bill, because I know he wants to speak a little while on it. I do not think he has any objection to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8143) for the protection of the fisheries of Alaska, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment.

The reading clerk read the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington explain why the provision beginning in line 17, on page 4, and going down to and including line 2, on page 5, is proposed to be stricken out of the bill? Apparently that is a very excellent provision.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I will explain that. Those two provisions were put in on the floor of the House of Representatives without the matter having been gone into very carefully.

Mr. ROBINSON. To what provision does the Senator from Washington refer?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I refer to the provision, beginning in line 17, on page 4, which the committee proposes to strike out. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In section 3, page 4, line 17, after the word "appliance," it is proposed to strike out the following clause:

> It shall be unlawful to drive, construct, set, or fish with any fixed or floating trap, weir, or pound net, or fish with purse seines in any bay, inlet, or estuary in Alaska, the width of which at its entrance is 3 miles or less, or within any channel or passage connecting larger bodies of water, where the width of said channel or passage is 3 miles or less, or within 1 mile of the entrance to any bay, inlet, or estuary which is 2 miles or less in width at its entrance, or within 1 mile of the mouth of any stream into which salmon are accustomed to run.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There are two provisions in the clause proposed to be stricken out, one involving fish traps and the other involving purse seines. There is quite a controversy with reference to the use of traps and the use of purse seines, but the committee of the House, in going into the matter, did not deem it advisable to prohibit the use of traps or of purse nets and left their control entirely to the Secretary of Commerce.

There are some places in Alaska, I think, where traps may properly be used, and there are other places where purse seines may properly be used. To prohibit the use of traps now would involve a loss of many hundreds of thousands of dollars, and to stop the use of purse seines as is proposed here would be a very great injury and detriment. Our committee felt that that action should not be taken without the most careful consideration, and it would require very extensive hearings. Those interested would insist upon hearings, and they would have a perfect right to be heard where so much in the way of property interests is involved and, furthermore, where the development and care of the fisheries is so greatly involved. There are so many other good things in the bill and so many very desirable things in it that our committee concluded rather than have the delay that would be occasioned by the necessity of holding hearings with reference to these provisions, which were put in, as I have stated, on the floor of the other House, we struck the provisions out.

Let me say that this seems to be as satisfactory a measure as could be obtained for all interests under the present condition of affairs.

The Delegate from Alaska is very much opposed to traps but is very much in favor of purse seines. He recognizes the situation, and, while he would like to have the traps prohibited and the purse seines retained, he is very anxious that this legislation, because of the conditions up there, shall pass as it is now framed, and then the question with reference to traps and purse seines can be fought out in subsequent legislation. What I have stated is about the situation with reference to these two provisions.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will suggest to the Senator that a reading of the bill and the statement of his reasons for moving to strike out the provisions would seem to indicate that it is going to be a very difficult thing to enforce this law, is it not? Is it not going to require a great many men to enforce it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no; it will not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Could the Senator give us some idea as to how many men it will require to enforce the law?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I can not tell how many; but the traps, of course, are definitely located; they are in fixed positions. There might be a little more difficulty about the purse seines; and yet, as Senators may know, some of the purse seines are a thousand feet long, or 1,800 feet long, or 3,000 feet long, so that they could not be used very surreptitiously. I do not think, therefore, that it would take very much extra force to enforce these provisions should they become law.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I myself wish to take the floor for a moment, if the Senator from Washington has concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, anyone who is familiar with the history of salmon fisheries in Pacific waters on the western coast of the United States and the streams that enter the Pacific there, and who has also some familiarity with the conditions now existing respecting Alaskan fisheries will at once realize the importance of legislation upon this subject. Salmon fishing in the waters of the western United States has about terminated because of the depletion of the supply of fish, and it is astonishing to know that in certain portions of the Alaskan waters the supply of salmon has been almost completely exhausted, so that the canneries located in certain communities have been compelled to suspend operations. Unless there shall be some effective legislation on the subject, this source of riches for the Alaskan people will disappear. It is in the fisheries rather than in the agricultural or even in the mineral prospects of Alaska that her prosperity, in all probability, is to be found. This bill does accomplish substantial results. Under the system which has heretofore prevailed, or which prevailed at least until the comparatively recent past, the fisheries have been unrestricted and the methods employed have left the fish with no prospect of survival.

I presume every Senator is familiar somewhat with the habits of the salmon fish. They spawn in fresh-water streams and after a certain time the young fish go out to sea, disappear for a long period, and then when they are ready to spawn they return to the waters where they originated, and after spawning die. Their habits are such that by placing traps and seines or nets across the mouth way or in the channel of the runs the entire run may be caught or captured.

This bill provides for escapement and for closed days or periods when no fishing may be done, and it gives, as I understand, the Secretary of Commerce the power to regulate both the places of fishing and the methods of fishing which may be employed.

I myself, in making a study of the subject some months ago, became rather prejudiced against the trap because the processes which it contemplates give the fish little or no chance for escape, but in view of the fact that discretion is vested in the Secretary and periods of escapement are provided, and places may be reserved where no fish may be caught for any purpose, I am pleased with the bill and should like to see it passed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment on page 4 may be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee on page 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have two or three other amendments that have been arranged by those who are interested in the matter, and especially the Delegate from Alaska, who has been consulted in this entire matter. I have tried to put the bill in such shape that he would be satisfied with it. I repeat the statement that I made awhile ago that he would like very much to have traps all prohibited, but, realizing the situation that exists, he is perfectly willing to let that question go over for future adjustment. The three amendments which I desire to offer have been submitted to him, and are agreeable to him. I send them to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 6, line 1, after the words "dog feed," it is proposed to insert:

Whenever the Secretary of Commerce shall find that conditions in any fishing area make such action advisable, he may advance, not more than 12 hours, both the opening and ending time of the closed period herein stipulated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether that amendment has been agreed to by the Delegate from Alaska?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It has; in fact, all the amendments I am now submitting have been submitted to the Delegate from Alaska.

Mr. KING. Are they in furtherance of the purpose which he has in view or, rather, do they conserve the interests of the canners as against the interests of the fish and the people of Alaska?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They are really in the interest of all.

Mr. FESS. Have they been submitted to the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They have.

Mr. FESS. And they meet his approval?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, after line 25, it is proposed to insert:

It shall be unlawful to import or bring into the Territory of Alaska, for purposes other than personal use and not for sale or barter, salmon taken from waters outside the jurisdiction of the United States, and adjacent to any fishing area during any closed period during which fishing is prohibited within said fishing area.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I present an amendment to come in as a new section. I will say that I do not believe that it is necessary, but the Delegate from Alaska, in order to be sure that this bill will not have a contrary effect to that suggested by the amendment, is very anxious to have the amendment adopted, and I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 7, after line 19, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 8. Nothing in this act contained, nor any powers herein conferred upon the Secretary of Commerce, shall abrogate or curtail the powers granted the Territorial Legislature of Alaska to impose taxes or licenses, nor limit or curtail any powers granted the Territorial Legislature of Alaska by the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, "To create a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska, to confer legislative power thereon, and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I should like to ask my colleague a question. As I understand, the situation in Alaska has been very unsatisfactory as it has been handled up to this time, and those who object to the conditions which have prevailed there charge them largely to the Secretary of Commerce, claiming that he has not treated them fairly. As I understand, the bill gives the Secretary of Commerce practically absolute power.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Secretary of Commerce sought to give exclusive right to fish in certain Alaskan water, and out of his attempt to give exclusive rights to fish, thus depriving a large number of the people of the right to pursue their usual vocation, great complaint arose. This bill, however, denies to the Secretary of Commerce any power to grant an exclusive right to fish and requires him to give everyone equal rights within the areas where fishing is permitted.

Mr. DILL. That is what I wanted to have made clear—as to whether this is an enlargement of his power or whether it is a limitation of his powers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill removes the principal cause of complaint with reference to the exercise of power by the Secretary of Commerce, just as the Senator from Arkansas has stated. Within the two reservations that were created by Executive order a year or two ago the Secretary of Commerce has seen fit to make regulations under which outsiders might not go in order to fish. In other words, those who are already located there, if he thought they took all the fish that should be taken, were given the full rights, and nobody else could go in there and take fish.

Mr. KING. They were given exclusive rights.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They may be called exclusive rights, but I want to say this in justice to the Secretary of Commerce:

When I came back this fall, and came down here, and we were considering matters of this kind, the Delegate from Alaska and I talked over the matter with reference to those exclusive rights, and I saw the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Commerce himself said that he would be glad to have that discretion taken away, that certainly he was not in favor of that policy, but those who were on the ground and who had been dealing with the matter especially and who might be considered to be experts had recommended and urged that that policy be pursued. I will say, in justice to him, that he said frankly that he would prefer not to have that absolute power, so I can say for him that he is glad that this provision is put in the bill prohibiting him from granting exclusive rights within the fishing areas up there.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I notice that there is a limitation as to taking not to exceed 50 per cent of the fish out of the water. What is the limitation now?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is no limitation now.

Mr. DILL. That is what I thought. To that extent, then, this bill is a restriction.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say, however, that the Secretary of Commerce—within the discretion that is placed in him with reference to these reservations established by Executive order, in two or three cases where he has gotten fish traps or measuring devices in a stream—has imposed a regulation that 50 per cent of the fish must be allowed to go up; so the provision in this bill, as a matter of fact, is only carrying out what the Secretary of Commerce has established.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I became interested in this particular bill from reading an editorial, which I thought was rather hypercritical of the Secretary of Commerce, and I went into the matter. Is it not a fact that the law that is now in existence was passed in 1906 and gave the Secretary of Commerce no further authority than he now is operating under, and has he not been urging this particular legislation for three years?

Mr. JONES of Washington. He has been urging legislation along these lines.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas in just a minute.

I want to say that the President, by Executive order, established two reservations. There is very serious question as to whether or not he had a legal right to do it; but he did it, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce—in fact, I think upon his recommendation—for the very purpose of saving the fish supply there. That is embodied in this bill, and legislative authority is given.

Mr. FESS. And the recommendation came originally from Doctor Smith; did it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I assume so, although I do not know. He was the Commissioner of Fisheries.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator has stated in part one thing that it was my purpose to say when I rose, and that is that no authority of law exists now for the Secretary of Commerce to create reservations. I have been unable to find any authority for him to grant exclusive rights of fishery. It was about that alleged abuse of authority that most of the complaint arose; namely, that the Secretary in some instances had created reservations, and in others had granted in certain waters the exclusive right to fish, usually to large corporations or packing concerns, which deprived the fishermen of the opportunity to pursue their occupations; and they desired very much the provision that is in this bill, which secures to every citizen of the United States the right to fish in Alaskan waters upon equal terms and without discrimination. The bill deprives the Secretary of any power, if he has it—and I do not think he has the power—to grant exclusive rights to fish in Alaskan waters. It affirmatively denies to him that power, and it is very wholesome in that respect.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say that I had the pleasure of visiting Alaska last summer. I spent two months there. I visited practically all of these fishing grounds and fishing sites, and so on; and without saying whether the Secretary's policy was the best or not, I will say that, taking everything into consideration, there is very great justification for the action that the Secretary took.

I am satisfied that whatever action the Secretary did take was taken with the honest purpose and intention of preserving the fish supply in Alaska, and that if what he did was wrong it was simply an error of judgment, rather than any desire to favor any interest of any kind or character. That is my judgment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was speaking of the question of legal authority. It never has been pointed out to me by anyone that such authority existed in the Secretary. Of course, in all probability his reason for granting exclusive rights to fish was to make it easier to regulate the catch and to preserve the supply. With everyone fishing, and with no means of policing the waters, it would seem much more probable that the supply would be completely exhausted than if a single concern were relied upon to control the fishing within a given area. Aside from the question of motive, however, he could exercise legally only such authority as the statute of Congress conferred upon him, and it did not confer that authority. Therefore it would appear that his act in assuming to grant exclusive rights to fish was unauthorized.

In addition to that, unquestionably it was necessary and is necessary to establish reservations. I think the Secretary justified his action in that particular as one of extreme necessity, rather than as one based upon express authorization of statute. He felt that to wait until Congress legislated upon the subject would be to suffer great loss and destruction of the supply of fish, and he took the chances involved in exercising an authority which is very doubtful, to say the least, and established certain reservations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator is right in that statement, and I think it is a very just statement to the Secretary.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I saw a letter written by the Secretary of Commerce in which he raised the question of the wisdom of the reservation, in that in a way it created a monopoly which he thought was unwise, and asked for legislation in order to relieve the situation. I understood in going over the hearings that there were at least 400 different companies and individuals fishing in those waters, and that unless the right was limited, and not expanded beyond the limit fixed, there would be danger of exhaustion of the fish. I have become greatly interested in the matter, just as the Senator from Arkansas has, somewhat incidentally, because of the peculiar character of the situation that obtains up there.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, we must have some restrictive measures there or the salmon supply of Alaska will be gone.

Mr. President, that completes the amendments to the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was just going to suggest, with the permission of the Senator, that I think the statement submitted by the able Senator from Arkansas is not only generous but more than generous in his treatment of the Secretary of Commerce. I am afraid the facts rather indicate that the Secretary of Commerce urged the President to do what I conceive to be an illegal act, much the same as it was illegal to transfer the oil lands and their control from the Navy Department to the Interior Department; and so soon as these reserves were established the Secretary of Commerce perpetuated in control various monopolies, and the manner in which they have operated has further depleted the fish supply.

Moreover, he has already granted permits for the coming year to the same canneries that have created a monopoly. If he had been so interested in conserving the rights of the people of Alaska and free fishing and proper fishing, I submit that he would not again have granted permits to these monopolies.

However, Mr. President, I expect to speak upon this bill tomorrow, if I can get the floor, at the earliest possible moment, because while the bill is not satisfactory to me, and I am sure is not satisfactory to many who understand the situation, it is better than the existing legislation; and therefore, I shall aid the Senator in securing its passage. Indeed, I have tried for several weeks to have the bill called up for passage when I perceived that it was impossible to get the kind of legislation that was needed. This bill gives too much authority to the Department of Commerce, and the conduct of the department in the past is not an assurance of a policy in the future that will conserve the fish supply and be conductive to the best interests of the American people.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator feels that he would not be prepared to dispose of the bill to-day?

Mr. KING. It is so late now——

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator has been very considerate; I appreciate that; and I know that he wants to take some little time in discussing the bill. I had hoped that I could get it through to-night, but if the Senator says he would not like to take it up now I will await my opportunity further.

Mr. KING. I should much prefer, if it suits the Senator, not to go on to-night. I will join with the Senator to-morrow in trying to pass the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know the Senator has been very kind.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this bill has nothing to do with the sanitary regulation of the canneries in Alaska, has it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it has not anything to do with that matter.

Mr. DILL. The Senator, of course, is familiar, as all of us are, with the grand jury report on the sanitary conditions in those canneries.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Somebody in this Government ought to have authority to clear up that situation. If it is one-tenth as bad as described in that grand jury report, it is a disgrace to American civilization that it is allowed to continue.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That should be dealt with by another committee and through another bill. I think bills have been introduced dealing with that phase of the matter.

Mr. President, if there is nothing further about this bill, of course I will defer to the wishes of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and not press the bill for passage now, and will let it rest until to-morrow.

ANNE C. SHYMER

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like permission to bring up Senate bill 2793, Order of Business 417, which was objected to the other night by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] under a misapprehension. This was thought to be a claim under the Lusitania commission, but it is not. It is a case of a woman who died on the Lusitania. Her body was recovered the same day, and the jewels were put in the possession of the consul at Cork, and were then sent on to the State Department in London and were lost. Here we have a unanimous report from the committee asking that relief in the amount of $3,900 be given to this estate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2793. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not object, with the understanding that immediately upon the disposition of this bill the Senate will take a recess or an adjournment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. A brief executive session is desired.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I have here a matter which will not lead to any debate. I am not going to object to the consideration of this bill, but I trust the Senator from Utah will not insist upon that understanding.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is utterly impossible for the Chair to hear when several Senators are claiming attention. Does the Senator from Utah object?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I made a conditional objection, which I appreciate would be unfair. Therefore I will not object, but I will say that my understanding was that with the disposition of the bill in which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is interested the Senate would take a recess.

Mr. JONES of Washington. After a brief executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has already agreed to take a recess. The Secretary will report the bill in order that the Chair may ascertain whether there is objection.

The bill was read.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not object to the consideration of this bill. It grows out of very unusual circumstances. It was the peculiar circumstance surrounding the case that prompted me to object on a former occasion, rather than any misapprehension as to the terms or effect of the bill. I have no objection to its present consideration.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$12,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$3,900," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the legal representatives of the estate of Anne C. Shymer, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,900, as full compensation for the loss of jewelry, the property of the aforesaid Anne C. Shymer, who was lost in the sinking of the Lusitania, which jewelry was transmitted to the State Department and was lost in transit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF COTTON FUTURES LAW

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, some time ago I introduced a bill (S. 3197) to amend section 5 of the United States cotton futures act to enable the buyer of a cotton-futures contract to demand actual delivery in fulfillment thereof prior to the close of the delivery month, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I conferred with the chairman of the committee to-day, and he says it will be impossible for them to take the bill up and consider it and report it out. He thought it would be a good plan, and I agreed with him, to move that the committee be discharged and that the bill be placed on the calendar. I realize that that motion will have to go over one day, and I desire to make the motion now.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. DIAL. It is in regard to the amendment of the future contract law in a special particular. It is not my main bill, but it is one about which I think the southern Senators can agree.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina gives notice of a motion to discharge the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry from the further consideration of the bill he has indicated.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand the unfinished business will be before the Senate when we meet to-morrow without any further action now, so I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 27, 1924, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONVENTION WITH GERMANY TO PREVENT THE SMUGGLING OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

In executive session this day, the following convention was ratified, and on motion of Mr. LODGE the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a convention between the United States and Germany to aid in the prevention of the smuggling of intoxicating liquors into the United States, signed at Washington on May 19, 1924.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 20, 1924.

THE PRESIDENT:

The undersigned the Secretary of State has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a convention between the United States and Germany to aid in the prevention of the smuggling of intoxicating liquors into the United States, signed at Washington on May 19, 1924.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 19, 1924.

The President of the United States of America and the President of the German Empire being desirous of avoiding any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws in force in the United States on the subject of alcoholic beverages have decided to conclude a convention for that purpose, and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America; Mr. Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

The President of the German Empire; Dr. Otto Wiedfeldt, German Ambassador to the United States of America;

Who, having communicated their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

The High Contracting Parties declare that it is their firm intention to uphold the principle that 3 marine miles extending from the coast line outward and measured from low-water mark constitute the proper limits of territorial waters.

ARTICLE II

(1) The President of the German Empire agrees that Germany will raise no objection to the boarding of private vessels under the German flag outside the limits of territorial waters by the authorities of the United States, its territories or possessions, in order that enquiries may be addressed to those on board and an examination be made of the ship's papers for the purpose of ascertaining whether the vessel or those on board are endeavoring to import or have imported alcoholic beverages into the United States, its territories or possessions, in violation of the laws there in force. When such enquiries and examinations show a reasonable ground for suspicion, a search of the vessel may be initiated.

(2) If there is reasonable cause for belief that the vessel has committed or is committing or attempting to commit an offense against the laws of the United States, its territories or possessions, prohibiting the importation of alcoholic beverages, the vessel may be seized and taken into a port of the United States, its territories or possessions, for adjudication in accordance with such laws.

(3) The rights conferred by this article shall not be exercised at a greater distance from the coast of the United States, its territories or possessions, than can be traversed in one hour by the vessel suspected of endeavoring to commit the offense. In cases, however, in which the liquor is intended to be conveyed to the United States, its territories or possessions, by a vessel other than the one boarded and searched, it shall be the speed of such other vessel and not the speed of the vessel boarded which shall determine the distance from the coast at which the right under this article can be exercised.

ARTICLE III

No penalty or forfeiture under the laws of the United States shall be applicable or attach to alcoholic liquors or to vessels or persons by reason of the carriage of such liquors, when such liquors are listed as sea stores or cargo destined for a port foreign to the United States, its territories or possessions, on board German vessels voyaging to or from ports of the United States, or its territories or possessions, or passing through the territorial waters thereof, and such carriage shall be as now provided by law with respect to the transit of such liquors through the Panama Canal, provided that such liquors shall be kept under seal continuously while the vessel on which they are carried remains within said territorial waters and that no part of such liquors shall at any time or place be unladen within the United States, its territories or possessions.

ARTICLE IV

Any claim by a German vessel for compensation on the grounds that it has suffered loss or injury through the improper or unreasonable exercise of the rights conferred by Article II of this treaty or on the ground that it has not been given the benefit of Article III shall be referred for the joint consideration of two persons, one of whom shall be nominated by each of the high contracting parties.

Effect shall be given to the recommendations contained in any such joint report. If no joint report can be agreed upon the claim shall be referred to the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague, described in the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes, concluded at The Hague October 18, 1907. The arbitral tribunal shall be constituted in accordance with article 87 (Chapter IV) and with article 59 (Chapter III) of the said convention. The proceedings shall be regulated by so much of Chapter IV of the said convention and of Chapter III thereof (special regard being had for articles 70 and 74, but excepting articles 53 and 54) as the tribunal may consider to be applicable and to be consistent with the provisions of this agreement. All sums of money which may be awarded by the tribunal on account of any claim shall be paid within 18 months after the date of the final award without interest and without deduction, save as hereafter specified. Each Government shall bear its own expenses. The expenses of the tribunal shall be defrayed by a ratable deduction of the amount of the sums awarded by it, at a rate of 5 per cent on such sums or at such lower rate as may be agreed upon between the two Governments; the deficiency, if any, shall be defrayed in equal moieties by the two Governments.

ARTICLE V

This treaty shall be subject to ratification and shall remain in force for a period of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications.

Three months before the expiration of the said period of one year either of the high contracting parties may give notice of its desire to propose modifications in the terms of the treaty.

If such modifications have not been agreed upon before the expiration of the term of one year mentioned above, the treaty shall lapse.

If no notice is given on either side of the desire to propose modifications, the treaty shall remain in force for another year, and so on automatically, but subject always in respect of each such period of a year to the right on either side to propose, as provided above three months before its expiration, modifications in the treaty, and to the provision that if such modifications are not agreed upon before the close of the period of one year the treaty shall lapse.

ARTICLE VI

In the event that either of the high contracting parties shall be prevented either by judicial decision or legislative action from giving full effect to the provisions of the present treaty, the said treaty shall automatically lapse, and on such lapse or whenever this treaty shall cease to be in force each high contracting party shall enjoy all the rights which it would have possessed had this treaty not been concluded.

The present convention shall be duly ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by the President of the German Empire in accordance with the requirements of the German constitution, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate and have thereunto affixed their seals.

Done at the city of Washington this 19th day of May, A. D. 1924.

CONVENTION WITH SWEDEN TO PREVENT SMUGGLING OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS

In executive session this day, the following convention was ratified, and on motion of Mr. LODGE the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a convention between the United States and Sweden signed at Washington on May 22, 1924, to aid in the prevention of the smuggling of intoxicating liquors into the United States.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 23, 1924.

THE PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a convention between the United States and Sweden to aid in the prevention of the smuggling of intoxicating liquors into the United States, signed at Washington on May 22, 1924.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 22, 1924.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of Sweden being desirous of avoiding any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws in force in the United States on the subject of alcoholic beverages have decided to conclude a convention for that purpose, and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, Mr. Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States;

His Majesty the King of Sweden, Mr. V. Assarsson, counselor of his legation at Washington;

Who, having communicated their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

The high contracting parties respectively retain their rights and claims, without prejudice by reason of this agreement, with respect to the extent of their territorial jurisdiction.

ARTICLE II

(1) His Majesty agrees that he will raise no objection to the boarding of private vessels under the Swedish flag outside the limits of territorial waters by the authorities of the United States, its territories or possessions, in order that inquiries may be addressed to those on board and an examination be made of the ship's papers for the purpose of ascertaining whether the vessel or those on board are endeavoring to import or have imported alcoholic beverages into the United States, its territories or possessions, in violation of the laws there in force. When such inquiries and examination show a reasonable ground for suspicion a search of the vessel may be initiated.

(2) If there is reasonable cause for belief that the vessel has committed or is committing or attempting to commit an offense against the laws of the United States, its territories or possessions, prohibiting the importation of alcoholic beverages, the vessel may be seized and taken into a port of the United States, its territories or possessions, for adjudication in accordance with such laws.

(3) The rights conferred by this article shall not be exercised at a greater distance from the coast of the United States, its territories or possessions, than can be traversed in one hour by the vessel suspected of endeavoring to commit the offense. In cases, however, in which the liquor is intended to be conveyed to the United States, its territories or possessions, by a vessel other than the one boarded and searched, it shall be the speed of such other vessel and not the speed of the vessel boarded which shall determine the distance from the coast at which the right under this article can be exercised.

ARTICLE III

No penalty or forfeiture under the laws of the United States shall be applicable or attach to alcoholic liquors or to vessels or persons by reason of the carriage of such liquors, when such liquors are listed as sea stores or cargo destined for a port foreign to the United States, its territories or possessions, on board Swedish vessels voyaging to or from ports of the United States, or its territories or possessions, or passing through the territorial waters thereof, and such carriage shall be as now provided by law with respect to the transit of such liquors through the Panama Canal, provided that such liquors shall be kept under seal continuously while the vessel on which they are carried remains within said territorial waters and that no part of such liquors shall at any time or place be unladen within the United States, its territories or possessions.

ARTICLE IV

Any claim by a Swedish vessel for compensation on the grounds that it has suffered loss or injury through the improper or unreasonable exercise of the rights conferred by Article II of this treaty or on the ground that it has not been given the benefit of Article III shall be referred for the joint consideration of two persons, one of whom shall be nominated by each of the high contracting parties.

Effect shall be given to the recommendations contained in any such joint report. If no joint report can be agreed upon, the claim shall be referred to the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague described in the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes, concluded at The Hague, October 18, 1907. The arbitral tribunal shall be constituted in accordance with article 87 (Chapter IV) and with article 59 (Chapter III) of the said convention. The proceedings shall be regulated by so much of Chapter IV of the said convention and of Chapter III thereof (special regard being had for articles 70 and 74, but excepting articles 53 and 54) as the tribunal may consider to be applicable and to be consistent with the provisions of this agreement. All sums of money which may be awarded by the tribunal on account of any claim shall be paid within 18 months after the date of the final award without interest and without deduction, save as hereafter specified. Each Government shall bear its own expense. The expenses of the tribunal shall be defrayed by a ratable deduction of the amount of the sums awarded by it, at a rate of 5 per cent on such sums, or at such lower rates as may be agreed upon between the two Governments; the deficiency, if any, shall be defrayed in equal moieties by the two Governments.

ARTICLE V

This treaty shall be subject to ratification and shall remain in force for a period of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications.

Three months before the expiration of the said period of one year, either of the high contracting parties may give notice of its desire to propose modifications in the terms of the treaty.

If such modifications have not been agreed upon before the expiration of the term of one year mentioned above, the treaty shall lapse.

If no notice is given on either side of the desire to propose modifications, the treaty shall remain in force for another year, and so on automatically, but subject always in respect of each such period of a year to the right on either side to propose as provided above three months before its expiration modifications in the treaty, and to the provision that if such modifications are not agreed upon before the close of the period of one year the treaty shall lapse.

ARTICLE VI

In the event that either of the high contracting parties shall be prevented either by judicial decision or legislative action from giving full effect to the provisions of the present treaty, the said treaty shall automatically lapse, and on such lapse or whenever this treaty shall cease to be in force each high contracting party shall enjoy all the rights which it would have possessed had this treaty not been concluded.

The present convention shall be duly ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Majesty the King of Sweden, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate in the English and Swedish languages and have thereunto affixed their seals.

Done at the city of Washington this 22d day of May, A. D 1924.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, May 26, 1924

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, our Father, what a comfort is ours in the consciousness that Thou art always near to bestow wisdom and lead us on our way. Frail and helpless though we are, yet in Thee do we put our trust and Thou wilt never fail us. Be near us this day and we shall have no fear; let Thy light be about us and we shall see no darkness; rule over us and sin shall lose its power. O be our ground of faith and our sky of hope. May the words of our mouth and the meditations of our hearts be acceptable in Thy sight O Lord, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journals of Saturday, May 24, and Sunday, May 25, 1924, were severally read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order in order that I may make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. RANKIN. I think we need a quorum present, but I will withhold it in order that the gentleman from New York may make his unanimous-consent request.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on train control.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on train control. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I secured unanimous consent to extend my remarks that I may place before Congress a brief statement regarding my bill, H. R. 9436, which is a bill to amend section 26 of the interstate commerce act as amended.

The purpose of this bill is the enforcement of orders made by the Interstate Commerce Commission making certain railroads equip sections of their lines with train-control or life-saving devices. It simply demands that the railroads carry out the orders of the commission and increases the penalty to $1,000 for each day that any common carrier refuses or neglects to comply with any order of the commission, and further provides that any person in whom has been vested by appropriate action of the board of directors or president of the carriers the duty to cause compliance of such order shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years if an accident involving a loss of human life occurs upon the railroad of such carrier, or if such accident is attributable to the nonfulfillment of the order, or if such director, officer, employee, or other person willfully or negligently failed to cause such compliance.

This bill has been introduced at this time in the interest of humanity and the saving of human life in railroad travel, both for employees and the traveling public.

The question of train control has been a subject of consideration by both the Interstate Commerce Commission and the railroads for several years. Nearly a year and a half ago the development of a device or devices for the purpose of train control was brought to such a state of efficiency that the Interstate Commerce Commission, noting the necessity for curbing to the greatest possible extent the loss of human life in passenger traffic, and after exhaustive investigation, determined that one or more of these systems had become of sufficient merit to warrant the issuance of an order in an endeavor to force the principal railroads to at least test out the merits of the subject.

An order issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission directing 49 of the principal carriers to equip at least one full division on each of these railroads with train control. Later on a second order was issued to these same roads. And later on a further order was issued to 46 of the remaining smaller roads.

To the present moment, as far as is known, no major effort has been made on the part of either of these roads, with one possible exception, to carry out that order; and, as set forth in the thirty-second annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission dated December 1, 1923, there were killed and injured, in the year 1923, in accidents upon these railroads, which would have been wholly preventable had the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission been carried out, the following number of people: One hundred and eighty-nine people killed in preventable accidents and 1,299 injured in preventable accidents, saying nothing with reference to the millions of dollars which would have been saved to these companies and to the public in the matter of equipment destroyed.

Recently a combination of railroad presidents or managers attempted to prevail upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to withdraw or extend the time of these orders, calling for this equipment to be installed on or before January 1, 1925, and January 1, 1926. After careful hearings and full investigation, the Interstate Commerce Commission declined to withdraw the order or to extend the period.

The proponent of this bill having given the matter full and careful consideration, and having no interest in it other than to assist, in any way he can, in bringing about the compliance of the order which he believes the Interstate Commerce Commission would not have issued unless it had positive knowledge of the fact that there was a device suitable for the purpose which could be applied to all passenger railroads at a moderate rate per mile, therefore is presenting the bill which has for its function the enforcement of these orders and makes no change in the law except to increase the penalty for nonfulfillment of same.

The only reason why the railroads have not adopted this life-saving device is the fact that the public has not been advised that there is such an appliance, as it is firmly believed public sentiment would almost immediately force the railroads to give the traveling public the benefit of this invention.

Surely everyone who steps on a railroad train feeling that because of the tremendous number of accidents which are taking place daily, owing to the defects of the human body and mind, would be at once relieved if they knew they would be protected by a mechanical device which would insure them perfect safety.

A case in point: For more than three years the Rock Island Railroad has had in operation 44 miles, and since December 1, 1922, has equipped 330 miles, of its great system of roads with a device known as the Regan train control. More than 100 of its engines have been connected with this device, and recently the vice president of this road, as well as its engineers, stated in their testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission that the system was working perfectly.

So there can be no good reason why the traveling public should not have the benefit of the thought of real security when they retire for the night upon a railroad train or start out for a day ride to some objective.

It is well known that all great railroads hesitate for many reasons to install new systems upon their roads with an endeavor by their own ingenuity to work out devices which would accomplish the same purposes in, perhaps, another way. But it is believed there has been time sufficient for the experiments and efforts on the part of the separate railroad companies to accomplish this desire, and sufficient human lives have been lost during that period of experiment, to the end that from now on the railroads should be forced to carry out the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission when human life is so largely involved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, while they are conferring with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], may I ask a question for information?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi withhold his point of order in order that the gentleman from Nebraska may ask a question?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; for a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Not being overly familiar with the practice, I desire to ask what is the practice in the absence of the chairman of a committee and one being desirous of propounding a question to the chairman? Would it be in order to ask the next in line to the chairman?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my point of order.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I did not ask it as a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. That is the only kind of an inquiry which can properly be made.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I know of nowhere else to go for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is evident there is no quorum present.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House, at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6715) to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report.

On amendment No. 1: The House bill provided that corporate earnings or profits accumulated or increase in value of property accrued before March 1, 1913, may be distributed exempt from tax after the earnings and profits accumulated after February 28, 1913, have been distributed. The Senate amendment adds to the list of tax-free distributions "capital paid in" before March 1, 1913; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 2: The House bill provided that the gain from a liquidating dividend, to the extent of the earnings and profits accumulated by the corporation since March 1, 1913, should be treated as a dividend and subject to the surtax rates. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision, with the result that a liquidating dividend is to be treated as a sale of stock and taxable as a gain from the sale of property; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 3: This amendment makes a clerical change; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 4: This amendment provides that there shall be included within the provisions of subdivision (d) of section 201 amounts distributed by corporations out of depletion reserves based upon the discovery value of mines. As contained in the House bill the provision includes distributions made out of depletion and depreciation reserves based upon the cost of the property depreciated or depleted, but, under the House bill, distributions out of depletion reserves based upon discovery value are treated as ordinary dividends. The Senate amendment applies only to depletion reserves based upon the discovery value of mines; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 5: This amendment is to clarify the wording of the House bill; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 6: The House bill provided that certain expenditures "properly chargeable" with respect to property should be taken into consideration in determining gain or loss. The Senate amendment limits such expenditures to those "previously allowed"; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 7: This amendment allows the exchange of common stock in a corporation for other common stock in the same corporation and of preferred stock in a corporation for other preferred stock in the same corporation, even though the exchange is not made in connection with the reorganization of the corporation; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 8: This amendment makes a clerical change; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 9, 10, and 11: These amendments are designed to clarify the provisions of the House bill and to show clearly that the types of transactions described in paragraphs (7) and (8) of subdivision (a) of section 204 are not within the provisions of paragraph (6) and are not subject to rules laid down therein, even though the particular transaction, because of the date of its occurrence or for some other reason, may not be within the provisions of paragraphs (7) or (8); and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 12: The House bill provided that where a person transfers assets to a corporation after December 31, 1920, in exchange for stock of the corporation in such a manner that no gain or loss to the transferor is recognized or that only a part of the gain or loss to the transferor is recognized, the basis of the assets in the hands of the corporation shall be the same as it would have been in the hands of the transferor, adjustment being made for any gain or loss recognized to the transferor upon the exchange. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision. The House recedes with an amendment restoring the language of the House bill but omitting the phrase "notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (6) of this subdivision," for the reasons explained in connection with amendment No. 9.

On amendments Nos. 13, 14, and 15: These amendments make changes in the numbering of the paragraphs; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 16: This amendment provides that in determining the fair market value of stock in a corporation as of March 1, 1913, due regard shall be given to the fair market value of the assets of the corporation as of that date; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 17: This amendment makes a clerical change; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 18: Subdivision (c) of section 204 of the House bill provided the basis upon which depletion, exhaustion, wear and tear, and obsolescence are to be allowed in respect of any property. The Senate amendment adds a sentence to the effect that discoveries, upon which depletion is based in certain cases, shall include minerals discovered or proven in an existing mine or mining tract by the taxpayer after February 28, 1913, not included in any prior valuation; and the Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 19, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, and 69: The House bill provided that in the case of any taxpayer (other than a corporation) who for any taxable year sustains a capital net loss, there shall be levied, collected, and paid in lieu of the taxes imposed by sections 210 and 211 a tax determined as follows: A partial tax shall first be computed upon the ordinary net income at the rates and in the manner provided in sections 210 and 211, and the total tax shall be this amount minus 12½ per cent of the capital net loss; but in no case shall the tax so computed be less than the tax imposed by sections 210 and 211 computed without regard to the provisions of this section. Senate amendment No. 30 struck out this provision and the other amendments struck out other provisions of the bill with reference to capital losses. The Senate recedes on amendment No. 30, which necessitates the restoration of all the provisions of the House bill with reference to capital losses, and consequently the Senate recedes with reference to the other amendments.

On amendment No. 20: This amendment makes a clerical change necessitated by the action of the conferees upon amendment No. 54; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 21, 22, and 23: The effect of these amendments and the action of the conferees thereon has been explained in connection with amendment No. 19.

On amendment No. 24: This amendment makes a clerical change; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 25, 26, 27, and 28: The effect of these amendments and the action of the conferees thereon has been explained in connection with amendment No. 19.

On amendment No. 29: The House bill provided that there should not be included within the term "capital assets" stock received as a stock dividend by the taxpayer, or by the donor if the taxpayer acquired the stock by gift. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36: The effect of these amendments and the action of the conferees thereon has been explained in connection with amendment No. 19.

On amendment No. 37: This amendment makes clerical changes; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 38: The House bill limited the amount which might be considered as earned net income to $20,000. The Senate amendment changes this amount to $10,000; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 39: The House bill provided for a credit against the income tax of an individual of 25 per cent of an amount bearing the same relation to the total amount of the tax as the amount of the earned net income bears to the total amount of the net income. The Senate amendment provides for the crediting against the tax of 25 per cent of the amount of tax which would be payable by the taxpayer on a total ordinary net income equal in amount to his earned net income. The House recedes with clerical amendments and with an amendment limiting the amount of the credit to 25 per cent of the normal tax of the taxpayer.

On amendment No. 40: This amendment makes a clerical change in the lettering of the subdivision; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 41: The House bill provided for a normal tax at the rate of 6 per cent except that in the case of the first $4,000 the tax was at the rate of 2 per cent, and upon the next $4,000 the tax was at the rate of 5 per cent. The Senate amendment provides that the tax upon the second $4,000 shall be at the rate of 4 per cent; and the House recedes with an amendment making clerical changes.

On amendment No. 42: The House bill provided for surtax rates ranging from 1½ per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,000, to 37½ per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $200,000. The Senate amendment provides for surtax rates ranging from 1 per cent of the net income in excess of $10,000 and not in excess of $14,000, to 40 per cent of the net income in excess of $500,000; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 43: The House bill provided that items of gross income should be considered to be received in the taxable year in which they are unqualifiedly made subject to the demands of the taxpayer. This provision was designed to require dividends, bond interests, and salaries such as drawing accounts, to be included in income when subject to demand by the taxpayer even though not actually received in cash by him. Since this is the rule which is and should be followed in such cases in the absence of a statutory provision, the Senate amendment strikes out the provision; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 44: The House bill provided that whenever any State, Territory, political subdivision, or the District of Columbia, prior to September 8, 1916, entered in good faith into a contract with any person, the object and purpose of which is to acquire, construct, operate, or maintain a public utility, the tax upon the income from the operation of such public utility shall be collected and paid in the manner and at the rates prescribed in this title, but there shall be refunded to such State, Territory, political subdivision, or the District of Columbia, a part of such tax equal to the amount by which the share of income from the operation of such public utility accruing to such State, Territory, political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia, was reduced by the imposition of such tax. The Senate amendment provides that in the case of such a contract no tax shall be levied under the provisions of this title upon the income derived from the operation of such public utility, so far as the payment thereof will impose a loss or burden upon such State, Territory, District of Columbia, or political subdivision; but that the provision is not intended and shall not be construed to confer upon such person any financial gain or exemption or to relieve such person from the payment of the tax as provided for in this title, upon the part or portion of such income to which such person is entitled under such contract. The House recedes, with an amendment providing that: (1) If by the terms of such contract the tax imposed by this title is to be paid out of the proceeds from the operation of such public utility, prior to any division of such proceeds between the person and the State, Territory, political subdivision, or the District of Columbia, and if, but for the imposition of the tax imposed by this title, a part of such proceeds for the taxable year would accrue directly to or for the use of such State, Territory, political subdivision, or the District of Columbia, then a tax upon the net income from the operation of such public utility shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the manner and at the rates prescribed in this title, but there shall be refunded to such State, Territory, political subdivision, or the District of Columbia (under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary), an amount which bears the same relation to the amount of the tax as the amount which (but for the imposition of the tax imposed by this title) would have accrued directly to or for the use of such State, Territory, political subdivision, or the District of Columbia, bears to the amount of the net income from the operation of such public utility for such taxable year; and (2) if by the terms of such contract no part of the proceeds from the operation of the public utility for the taxable year would, irrespective of the tax imposed by this title, accrue directly to or for the use of such State, Territory, political subdivision, or the District of Columbia, then the tax upon the net income of such person from the operation of such public utility shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the manner and at the rates prescribed in this title.

On amendment No. 45: This paragraph of the House bill exempts from gross income certain amounts received as compensation or allowances under the war risk insurance and vocational rehabilitation acts. The amendment adds to the list of these acts "World War veterans' act, 1924," under which certain compensation and allowances will be paid in the future; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 46: The Senate amendment adds to the items enumerated as exempt from taxation a State pension for services rendered by the beneficiary or another for which the State is paying a pension; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 47: The House bill provided that there shall be allowed as deductions in computing net income of an individual all interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness. The Senate amendment added to this provision "except on indebtedness incurred or continued for the purpose of evading the payment of taxes and also except indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities (other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, and originally subscribed for by the taxpayer) the interest upon which is wholly exempt from taxation under this title;". The House, in view of the action of the conferees on amendment No. 54, recedes, with an amendment which restores the language of the existing law, striking out of the provision added by the Senate amendment the words "incurred or continued for the purpose of evading the payment of taxes and also except indebtedness."

On amendments Nos. 48 and 80: The Senate amendments add a provision to the effect that taxes or assessments levied to pay the cost of construction or maintenance of works to protect property from damage or destruction by floods, or annual or periodical taxes assessed against construction or repair of levees or drainage improvements, may be deducted in computing net income; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 49: The Senate amendment adds religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational trusts to the list of organizations contributions to which are deductible in computing net income under the act; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 50: This amendment makes a clerical change; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 51: This amendment allows the deduction of contributions to a fraternal society, order, or association, operating under the lodge system, or community chest, but only if such contributions or gifts are to be used exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals. The House recedes with an amendment striking out the words "or community chest."

On amendment No. 52: The House bill limits to 15 per cent of the taxpayer's net income the amount which he can deduct, in computing net income, for contributions to charity. The Senate amendment provides that this limitation shall not apply if the taxpayer has in each of the 10 preceding years, as well as the year in question, contributed an amount equal to or exceeding 90 per cent of his income for each such year to the organizations and for the purposes specified in this paragraph; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 53: The Senate amendment adds two paragraphs to subdivision (a) of section 214, which sets forth the deductions allowed in computing net income, which paragraphs make special provision for computing net income and deductions in the case of lands managed for the production of crops of timber; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 54: The House bill provided that the deduction for interest paid on indebtedness (except indebtedness incurred in connection with the trade or business of the taxpayer) and the deduction for nonbusiness losses should be allowed as deductions in computing net income only, if and to the extent that the sum of these amounts exceeds the income of the taxpayer from tax-exempt securities. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 55: The House bill provided a personal exemption in the case of a single person of $1,000, or in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, of $2,500, unless the net income is in excess of $5,000, in which case the personal exemption shall be $2,000. The Senate amendment provides a personal exemption in the case of a single person of $1,000, or in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husand or wife, of $2,500; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 56: The House bill retained the provisions of the existing law to the effect that the personal exemption and the credit for dependents should be determined by the status of the taxpayer on the last day of the period for which the return of income is made. The Senate amendment provides that in case the status of the taxpayer changes during his taxable year personal exemption should be prorated according to the number of months during which the taxpayer occupied each status. The House recedes with a clerical amendment made necessary by the action taken on amendment No. 55.

On amendments Nos. 57, 58, and 59: These amendments make clerical changes; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 60: This amendment excepts from the general provisions of the subdivision, which provides the general method of taxing the incomes of estates and trusts, subdivisions (g) and (h) of section 219, which provide a method for taxing the incomes of estates and trusts in specific cases; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 61: The Senate amendment provides for the deduction in computing the net income of a trust of any part of the gross income which, pursuant to the terms of the will or deed creating the trust, is paid by the trustee or permanently set aside for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, or for a public cemetery not operated for profit. The House recedes with an amendment making clerical changes.

On amendment No. 62: The House bill provided that where the grantor of a trust reserves the power to revoke the trust the income of the trust shall be included in computing the net income of the grantor. The Senate amendment provides for the taxation to the grantor of the income of a trust, if he, either alone or in conjunction with any person, has the power during the taxable year to revoke the trust. The House recedes with an amendment providing for the taxation to the grantor of the income of a trust if the grantor, either alone or in conjunction with any person not a beneficiary of the trust, has the power during the taxable year to revoke the trust.

On amendment No. 63: The House bill provided that where any part of the income of a trust may, in the discretion of any person, including the grantor of the trust, be distributed to the grantor or be held or accumulated for future distribution to him, or where any part of the income of the trust is or may be applied to the payment of premiums upon policies of insurance on the life of the grantor, whether payable to his estate or otherwise, such part of the income of the trust should be included in computing the net income of the grantor. The Senate amendment provides that where any part of the income of a trust may, in the discretion of the grantor of the trust, either alone or in conjunction with any person, be distributed to the grantor or held or accumulated for future distribution to him, or applied to the payment of premiums upon policies of insurance on his life, except policies payable to benevolent organizations specified in section 214 (a) (10), the income shall be included in computing the net income of the grantor. The House recedes with an amendment limiting the application of the subdivision to cases where the income of the trust may, in the discretion of the grantor of the trust, either alone or in conjunction with any person not a beneficiary of the trust, be distributed to the grantor, accumulated for future distribution to him, or so used in the payment of premiums upon policies of insurance on his life.

On amendment No. 64: The House bill provided that if any corporation is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of surtaxes upon its shareholders by permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being distributed, there should be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 25 per cent of the amount of the earnings in addition to the tax imposed by section 230. The Senate amendment changes the rate of the tax from 25 to 50 per cent; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 65: The House bill provided that if all the shareholders of a corporation formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its shareholders should agree thereto, the commissioner might, in lieu of all income taxes imposed upon the corporation for the taxable year, tax the shareholders of such corporation upon their distributive shares in the net income of the corporation for the taxable year in the same manner as provided in subdivision (a) of section 218 in the case of members of a partnership. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 66, 67, and 68: These amendments make clerical changes; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 69: The effect of this amendment and the action of the conferees thereon has been explained in connection with amendment No. 19.

On amendment No. 70: The House bill provided that partnership and fiduciary returns on which no tax is shown to be due should be filed with the commissioner. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision, thereby restoring the subdivision to the form in which it appears in the existing law; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 71: The Senate amendment provides that the shareholders of any corporation may, if they all agree thereto, elect to be taxed in the same manner as the members of a partnership, and, in any such case, the corporation shall be exempt from tax; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 72: The House provided for a tax of 12½ per cent upon the net income of every corporation in excess of the credits provided in sections 236 and 263. The Senate amendment strikes out this provision and inserts in lieu thereof provisions for a normal tax upon the net income of every corporation of 9 per cent, and for surtaxes upon the amount of its surtax net income, as therein defined, based upon the relation between the undistributed net income and the surtax net income; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 73: This amendment makes a clerical change; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 74: This amendment makes a clerical change; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 75: The House bill provided that local associations of employees, the membership of which is limited to employees of a designated person or persons in a particular municipality and the net earnings of which are devoted exclusively to charitable, educational, or recreational purposes, whether or not for the benefit of the members and their families, should be exempt from income taxation. The Senate amendment strikes out the words "whether or not for the benefit of the members and their families"; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 76 and 79: The House bill provided for the exemption of benevolent mutual life insurance associations not operated for profit, whose business is purely local and wholly for the benefit of its members. Senate amendment No. 79 strikes out this provision, but amendment No. 76 provides for the exemption of mutual life insurance companies if 85 per cent or more of the income consists of amounts collected from members for the sole purpose of meeting losses and expenses. The Senate recedes on amendment No. 76, and the House recedes on amendment No. 79, with an amendment providing for the exemption of benevolent life insurance associations of a purely local character, if 85 per cent or more of the income consists of amounts collected from members for the sole purpose of meeting losses and expenses.

The Senate amendment changes these percentages to 95; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 87: The House bill provided that the commissioner shall consolidate the gains of related trades and businesses in certain cases. The Senate amendment provides that the commissioner may, and at the request of the taxpayer shall, consolidate the accounts in certain specified cases; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 88 and 91: The House bill provides that there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of certain specified insurance companies a specified tax, in lieu of the tax imposed by sections 230 and 800. The Senate amendments strike out the words "taxes imposed by sections 230 and 800," and insert in lieu thereof "tax imposed by section 230"; and the House recedes with amendments restoring the language of the House bill with clerical amendments.

On amendments Nos. 89 and 92: The House bill provided for a tax upon certain insurance companies of "the same percentage of its net income as is imposed upon other corporations by section 230." On amendments Nos. 253 and 254: The Senate amendment provides that the stamp tax on playing cards imposed by the existing law shall be repealed upon the enactment of this act. The House bill provides that this tax as well as the other stamp taxes shall be repealed, effective on the expiration of 30 days after the enactment of this act; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 255: The Senate amendment provides that the legislative drafting service shall hereafter be known as the office of the legislative counsel; that the positions of the two legislative counsel shall be allocated by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House under the schedules of the classification act, and that the legislative counsel shall have the privilege of free transmission of official mail; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 256: The Senate amendment provides that the salary of the Government Actuary, so long as the position is held by the present incumbent, shall be at the rate of $7,500 a year; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 257: The Senate amendment strikes out a section of the House bill providing specifically for an allowance for subsistence for officers and employees of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, while traveling on official business, in an amount not to exceed $7 per day; and the House recedes.

On amendments Nos. 258 and 259: These amendments make clerical changes in the numbering of the sections; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 260: This amendment provides for a reduction of the postal rates in the case of the portion of publications devoted to advertisements; and the Senate recedes.

W. R. GREEN,
W. C. HAWLEY,
ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
JNO. N. GARNER,
J. W. COLLIER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the managers of the conference on the part of the House come back to the House with great pleasure, reporting that they return this bill to the House substantially as it left it, the Senate having receded in the most important particulars. [Applause.] They also report to the House a bill which I can assure the country will not create a deficit. [Applause.] I hold in my hand the last estimate made by the Actuary of the Treasury with reference to the Treasury conditions under this bill in the fiscal year of 1925. This morning I talked with the Actuary of the Treasury over the telephone with reference to the balance remaining in the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year 1924—that is, the balance on June 30, next. The House will remember I told them a few days ago that there would be sufficient surplus for the fiscal year 1924 to pay the bonus twice over. [Applause.] The Actuary of the Treasury assures me this morning that I was well within the limits of accuracy so far as that part is concerned. This statement which I hold in my hand, coming from him, also shows that the surplus for the fiscal year 1925, without including the bonus, which can be taken care of out of the previous surplus, will be $138,000,000. [Applause.] It also shows—and I want to particularly call the attention of the House to this point—that the difference between the present bill as now returned to you and what is commonly denominated as the Mellon plan is only a comparatively small amount.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Twenty-two million dollars.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Twenty-two million dollars, of which $10,000,000 is in the individual income and corporation taxes and the balance in the excise taxes, from which the House will remember we took off more than did the original Mellon plan. This bill will bring into the Treasury $22,000,000 less than the Mellon plan.

I think this is all I care to say in opening the debate, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I fear we will not get through in an hour and a half if I start yielding.

Mr. MAPES. My question is very short.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What is it?

Mr. MAPES. In giving the Actuary of the Treasury as your authority, does that mean that the Treasury Department sustains and approves the figures which you have stated?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It means that the Treasury admits these figures to be correct.

Mr. MAPES. The department?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Treasury Department; yes. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that, of course, the returns under the present law for this fiscal year are very much larger than was anticipated last fall.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. In stating $138,000,000 as the surplus that would be on hand at the close of this fiscal year, does the gentleman mean that that would be after the 25 per cent tax that is remitted for this year has been taken care of?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. One hundred and thirty-eight million dollars is the surplus in the fiscal year 1925, out of which one-half of the reduction is taken. The other one-half comes out of this fiscal year, 1924, and the statement I made that we would have sufficient to pay the bonus twice over out of the surplus for the year 1924 makes due allowance for the payment of the 25 per cent reduction.

Mr. SNYDER. I just wanted the gentleman to make that clear, because I did not think it was clear in his original statement.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And it is the same way with reference to the surplus for the fiscal year 1925.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield for one short question? In reference to the inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan, the figures submitted by the distinguished chairman do not come from the same source that announced two years ago we would have a deficit of $500,000,000 when we found a surplus of $325,000,000?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not go into matters of that kind. I want to yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] five minutes.

Mr. ANDREW. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield merely for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What is the question of the gentleman?

Mr. ANDREW. You said that the difference between the reduction contemplated by this bill and the Mellon plan was a difference of $22,000,000. Does that mean that this bill reduces the taxes by $22,000,000 more or $22,000,000 less?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Twenty-two million dollars more. It reduces the taxes $22,000,000.

Mr. RICHARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am sorry I can not yield further.

Mr. RICHARDS. Does the gentleman intend putting that statement in the RECORD?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I will.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Estimated revenue, fiscal year 1925

(Revenue act of 1924 as agreed to in conference)

Source	Mellon plan	Present law	Revenue act of 1924
Customs	$500,000,000	$500,000,000	$500,000,000
Internal revenue:
Individual income and corporation tax	1,662,000,000	1,900,000,000	1,650,000,000
Miscellaneous taxes	824,000,000	925,000,000	814,000,000
Total internal revenue taxes	2,486,000,000	2,825,000,000	2,464,000,000
Miscellaneous receipts	473,000,000	473,000,000	473,000,000
Total ordinary receipts	3,459,000,000	3,798,000,000	3,437,000,000
Expenditures chargeable against ordinary receipts (Budget estimate of December 3, 1923, not including additional expenditures authorized or to be authorized since that date)	3,298,100,000	3,298,100,000	3,298,100,000
Excess of ordinary receipts over total expenditures chargeable against ordinary receipts	160,900,000	499,900,000	138,900,000

To this surplus should be added whatever taxes are collected by the department in excess of $200,000,000 on account of income and profits taxes for previous years.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] five minutes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I also yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there is nothing to be gained by discussing the main provisions of the bill. The House did that very thoroughly and, as the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee has stated, this bill is substantially the bill that passed the House except in two very important particulars.

Let me state now that I am not one of those who holds that a vote against a conference report is a vote against the bill, and it seems to me that men who voted for the bill may very well vote against this conference report in protest as to the two matters which I am about to call the attention of the House to.

This bill aside from being a measure to reduce taxes was a measure to improve the administration of the tax laws and to give some measure of relief to the taxpayers who, for four or five or six or seven years, have never known what their tax liability was. It was to give them some relief inside of the Treasury Department and not make them in all cases, in order to get justice, ultimately have to rely on the courts.

With that end in view it was originally proposed by the Treasury, and this House passed a bill providing for the creation of a board of appeals, so that if the taxpayer was notified that his tax would be increased before the tax was assessed he had a right to go before that board of appeals, which was appointed by the President and was not a part of the Treasury Tax Bureau but was an administrative body nevertheless. He would sit down with them, one member if necessary, and adjust his tax liability expeditiously and justly; and if the Government disagreed with the findings, the Government could go to court; and if the taxpayer was aggrieved, he could go to court. To-day there is existing in the Treasury Department what is known as a committee on review, composed of 24 members, to which the taxpayer goes for final adjustment of his case before going to court.

This bill contemplates doing away with the committee on review and to substitute for it a board of appeals. Now, what the Senate did was to change the board of appeals, which was an administrative body sitting informally to adjust tax cases, into a court of record, and the House conferees have agreed to that. In all cases over $10,000 the testimony must be taken in writing, the rules of evidence apply, a written opinion is to be given, and all of the testimony in the proceedings is to be a public record.

Gentlemen, cases are coming to the present board of review at the rate of 200 a week. There are 35,000 cases still without adjustment. Tax returns for 1918 and 1919 are still undecided, with all that implies in the way of hardship to the taxpayer. The committee on review to-day is an informal body. One member can settle and adjust a case. This bill provides that it shall take three members to decide a case. Do you suppose a new court with all formal court procedure can dispose of 200 cases a week? Instead of improving the administrative machinery you have wrecked it. You have taken away the administration committee of review and you have told the taxpayer not to adjust his case in the Treasury Department, but to go to a new tax court with all the formalities of procedure. To-day it takes four or five years to adjust a case and we were trying to eliminate this delay. An administrative reform has been transformed into administrative obstruction. I suggest that in the new court it will take 10 years.

Now let me point out another matter. No one who knows anything about it thinks that the taxpayer is treated with leniency by the United States Government to-day. We all know that after the statute of limitations has run, or is about to run, the Treasury comes to Congress and gets an extension for another year. That has been done two or three times so that they can keep the tax liability open for six or seven years. If Congress will not do it, the Treasury slaps on an arbitrary assessment without taking the trouble to audit the taxpayer's return. We want not only to give the taxpayer a tax reduction but decent administration. [Applause.] We want to give him relief from these arbitrary governmental methods. We want to expedite the settlement of claims, and the Senate instead of doing that has given us a court with all of the delays incident to court procedure.

Why, the one thing that amazes any new Member—and I do not longer fall within that class—is the amazing knowledge on a great variety of subjects displayed on the floor of the House when matters of public importance come up. And yet when it comes to this question of tax administration and procedure this House seems to be willing to legislate without any knowledge whatever. I state without fear of contradiction that there is not a single Member in this House that has thoroughly investigated the question of tax administration and collection, and I venture to say there is not a single Member on the other side of the Capitol that has done so. And yet without investigation, without knowledge, in the face of the strongest protest on the part of those who are called on to administer the law, we are willing to wreck a carefully thought-out scheme which they prepared to improve the administration of the law.

The taxpayer to-day has a hard enough time in getting justice from the Government, and here you are going to place additional burdens on him. The Government comes along four or five years after he has paid his tax and says, "I am going to slap on an additional assessment." The taxpayer wants to protest. He wants to fight it, the Government now says "Yes; you may fight it, but in addition to the old burden that rested on you we are going to compel you to disclose to the public every one of your business transactions during that particular year." Is not the taxpayer in many cases going to hesitate? Is not he in many cases going to say, "All right, take my money, it is better for me and my business after having had a bad year in business to let the money go rather than to disclose to all my competitors and creditors my situation?"

You are placing in the hands of the Government an additional club to compel this taxpayer to come across, irrespective of justice or equity.

The ridiculous provision which the conferees have agreed to with reference to the publication of the name of every income taxpayer, together with the amount of his tax, needs no comment. There is not a man on this floor, there is not a man anywhere, who can suggest how the publication of the amount of the tax paid by an individual will facilitate the collection of the tax. I wish some of the conferees would explain to the House how the publication of that information can be of any conceivable public benefit. Everyone knows that the sole purpose it can serve is to satisfy the curiosity of individuals as to what taxes their neighbors are paying. It is an invasion of privacy unjustified by any public good. It is impossible to justify it, and I think that you gentlemen, if you vote for this conference report, will find it mighty difficult to go home to your districts and explain to the income-tax payers, whom you represent, why you voted to post their names, together with the tax paid. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an article which appeared in The Nation of May 28, 1924, by William Hard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman putting in his own remarks, but if that article goes in, there are some articles that ought to go in controverting it.

Mr. MILLS. The article does not deal strictly with tax matters, but is a comment on the present tendency in this country to invade privacy.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York does not intend to extend the entire Mellon book in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLS. I think it would be of great public benefit if it could be done, but I do not propose to do that. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not object to my request.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Just for the moment I shall object, until I can see the gendeman later.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, in view of the limited time for debate, that each Member may have five legislative days in which to extend his own remarks in the RECORD on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days within which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. Is that entirely their own remarks?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, once more Congress will be coming into its own when it passes the revenue bill that is now before us, the conference report of the House and Senate. Not long ago Congress in passing the soldiers' bonus over the President's veto by the overwhelming vote of 313 to 78 demonstrated that it can and will exercise its constitutional powers and uphold the trust the Nation has bestowed upon it. That it will now again decisively demonstrate the same kind of independence and good sense of judgment by passing this bill I have no doubt in my mind.

But only a short time ago the efforts on the part of the progressives to bring about a genuine, scientific, and equitable solution of our tax problems seemed to be resigned to the fate of certain failure. It, indeed, was a valiant fight, and we won.

For many months this Congress and the country was harassed by the persistent and strongly organized propaganda campaign put forth by the friends of the Mellon tax plan in Wall Street. Newspapers gave daily accounts and statements about it in a most conspicuous fashion. Full-page paid advertisements were carried by nearly every paper. Every scheme was devised to put this bill across. We were warned of the disastrous effect it would have on our country should this bill be rejected. Congressmen were literally flooded with propaganda. The theater-going public was constantly being imposed upon by an extra reel of moving pictures in which Mr. Mellon played the rôle of hero in the Mellon tax, you all, me not, plan. President Coolidge, Mr. Mellon, and big business were out to sell this plan to you and the public. Some Congressmen proposed to do a little changing in its make-up, but you were told by its sponsors, "You must take it as it is." Not an "i" to be dotted nor a "t" to be crossed.

The progressives, however, in their determined fight against this infamous measure soon were able to reveal the true nature of the bill. We now were no longer alone in this fight, and with the aid of the Democrats this widely heralded bill known as the Mellon plan met its fate. It should have been scrapped from the very start, and Congress should not even have given this veiled attempt upon the Treasury of the United States by big business the dignity of such long and protracted consideration!

I would like to review the main provisions of the Mellon plan in order to compare that scheme for tax reduction with the plan now before us.

But I will not take the time of this body at present. I have on a previous occasion discussed this bill in greater detail. It is a matter of record, and if you will you can refer to my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 6, page 3376, where its workings are clearly shown.

The rates under the present bill, which is about to be acted upon by this body, as compared with the old law now in effect can be illustrated as follows:

Income	Present law	Conference schedule
$3,000	$20.00	$7.50
$4,000	60.00	22.50
$5,000	100.00	37.50
$6,000	160.00	57.50
$7,000	250.00	87.50
$8,000	430.00	167.50
$10,000	520.00	207.50
$14,000	940.00	477.50
$20,000	1,720.00	1,017.50
$26,000	2,740.00	1,737.50
$36,000	4,660.00	3,297.50
$50,000	8,640.00	6,137.50
$100,000	30,140.00	22,617.50
$500,000	144,640.00	129,617.50
$1,000,000	550,640.00	429,617.50

It is indeed gratifying to see the many important proposals of the progressives now embodied in a truly scientific and good bill.

While many do not receive incomes large enough to benefit from the reduction on income-tax rates, it can truthfully be said, however, that even as to them this bill is of vital concern. The burdensome taxes on consumers' articles have been lifted, the amusement taxes are abolished, and all other such nuisance taxes directly affecting the interests of the common man have all been materially reduced or abolished by this new bill.

The inheritance and the gift tax feature, too, are indeed significant changes in the tax policy of this Nation. But perhaps no single feature stands out so distinctly a departure from the orthodox policy in our scheme of taxation as does the publicity feature on incomes. This, indeed, will be a shock to those who have been able to evade paying their fullest share of taxes by falsifying on their income figures.

This virtually means millions of dollars for our Treasury in income taxes heretofore uncollectible because it was possible for such unscrupulous individuals to falsify as to their actual incomes without a chance for the Government to look into the records of such individuals. These income-tax dodgers can no longer take refuge under a secrecy clause. The publicity feature will then not only bring more money into the Treasury but naturally will make for greater honesty in income-tax reports, and fraud upon the Government by falsification of the amounts of their incomes will be less possible.

While, to be sure, there are many features in the bill that could still be materially improved upon and many provisions that I would like to have included, yet under the circumstances I think this is very meritorious legislation.

With this bill assured of its passage, and the tax problem solved to the satisfaction of the vast majority, we should now turn our energies with unrelentless zeal to the task of passing the child labor amendment, the Howell-Barkley railroad labor bill, and a really and truly beneficial farm-relief measure like the Norris-Sinclair bill. With this kind of legislation enacted into law, you who will favor these measures can return to your respective constituencies and point with pride to the accomplishments of this Congress. To fail in passing these, those of you who will oppose this kind of remedial legislation will continue to foster the evil of child labor and oppose the interests of the struggling farmers and workers of this country.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD.]

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am highly complimented in being permitted to follow one of my colleagues among the "unalterable eight" who voted against this bill when it passed the House. I am opposed to the conference report, but not along the lines of the opposition of the gentleman from New York. He asked a question here a moment ago, quite directly, of any member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and all of them were silent. He asked what public good would be accomplished by the publication of the income-tax returns. None of you gave any answer to him. I think I can give him an answer, and he is deserving every good thing. Here is my answer, in the form of an illustration. In my own State we have a statute authorizing the publication of personal-tax returns, authorizing the county commissioners to direct it if they please. They do it in some counties, and in others they do not. I could present the gentleman from New York with evidence showing that in many counties where the personal-tax returns have been published the publication resulted sometimes in almost doubling the amount of the personal-tax returns the next year. I think that is sufficient to prove the value of publicity, and I apprehend that this new provision with reference to publicity of income-tax returns should be just as salutary in digging up and putting on the books income tax returns that have not been there hitherto.

I am all mixed up here, but I am told that this new conference report is a great victory for those of us who supported the Garner tax figures, and yet here comes the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and tells us that the conference report as now presented is practically the same as the original Mellon figures.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no. I said practically the same as the House bill that we passed before by such an enormous majority.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I am delighted to have the gentleman reverse himself, or correct himself, as it will be easier for me now to vote for the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not doing either one. I am neither reversing myself nor correcting myself, but I am stating just what I said.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Ah, but the gentleman is correcting himself in my ear. It would be very difficult for me to vote for this conference report for any other reason. I understand that in your agreement you kept in the bill that infamous provision which gives the taxpayer the privilege of going to the Treasury now and taking out one-quarter of the tax that he has already paid on the 1923 returns. I think that is wicked. I paid some of that tax, and members of my own family have paid it, and I figured up the other day and discovered that if I should vote for this conference report now, it would be equivalent to voting in favor of permission for EDGAR HOWARD and various members of his family connections to reach down into the Treasury and lift out almost $2,000 of taxes, money already earned by the Government, which we have paid. I think that is wicked. I do not wish to vote for it for that reason, and will try to have the report recommitted for the purpose of striking out that 1923 refund.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], one of my colleagues among the "eight unalterables," and sometimes I understand that we have been referred to as the "eight undesirables," opposes this conference report on entirely different lines from me. He opposes it because of its good features, and I oppose it because of its bad features, which he holds to be good.

I have been earnestly hoping that the rules might permit me to move to recommit the report of the conferees, my best hope being that a new report might provide for the most just of all taxing provisions—the excess-profits tax—and also that the conferees might be persuaded to remove from their agreement that bad provision for refund of one-fourth of the 1923 income tax. But indications are clear that there will be no chance for recommittal, and so I must either vote for or against the bill as a whole. I can not vote against it for, indeed, it is so much better than I had dreamed of getting, bad as it is, and so far removed from the original Mellon plan of iniquity that I feel I must vote for it, the while giving my thanks to that magnificent Democrat, JOHN GARNER, of Texas, and that superb Republican, WILLIAM R. GREEN, of Iowa, for the rebuke their reorganized bill administers to an occupant of the White House and to an arrogant Secretary of the Treasury, both of whom have signally failed to bluff the legislative arm of the Republic into obedience to the will of the executive arm.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I am glad of it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the gentleman from Iowa yields five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I yield him five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who preceded me, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], complained about the publicity proposition in the tax conference bill before us and that it is calculated to make people curious as to incomes paid by taxpayers generally. It will enable every Member on the floor of this House to know what influence is behind propositions when a Member proposes an amendment here or passes his judgment upon an income tax bill. The public will see his personal interest, and they will discover quickly from the record whether his personal interest reaches $100,000 or $1,000,000, or whatever the amount may be, or whether his interest is purely in behalf of the taxpayers of the country. We would then know what influences Mellon bill advocates and how much is involved in taxes on them.

Mr. CAREW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I can not, I am sorry to say. Mr. Speaker, this bill, in my judgment, is the most scientific bill that has ever been offered in the nature of a revenue bill in the history of this country. It takes not only the income tax and places it on a 40 per cent graduating basis, which is far more honest and fair than existing law or the Mellon plan.

The inheritance tax is also graduated to 40 per cent. The gift tax is also graduated to 40 per cent, and then under the bill the public has the right to know how men are evading their taxes so that Congress may legislate to avoid tax-dodging pitfalls. In this bill the normal tax is equitably graduated, the earned income is limited to reasonable exemptions, and the nuisance or excise taxes are far better adjusted than under the present law or Mellon bill. Therefore I say it is the most comprehensive and most scientific bill that has ever been presented and that will be passed by Congress. Two Washington morning papers have declared repeatedly Congress, in tax legislation, is engaged in politics because we are endeavoring to pass a bill that is for the benefit of the country rather than for a handful of multimillionaires for whom the Mellon bill was drawn. Remember, gentlemen, that both of these papers are owned by multimillionaires, and it makes a big difference to them whether we adopt the Mellon plan or the plan of the House. Hundreds of thousands annually would have been saved each of them by the Mellon plan. [Applause.] Both of these papers and practically all interests supporting the Mellon plan sought to place on the people a vicious consumption tax last session. That plan was defeated. The country, it has been said, has now had sold to it the Mellon plan. It has had sold to it a Mellon brick, and it is a gold brick, as we know, but the House and Senate, the Congress of the United States, have been wise enough not to accept that gold brick, and have repudiated it. [Applause.]

I congratulate the chairman of the committee, Judge GREEN, who is still chairman of the committee, and has not yet been deposed or overridden by the House. I congratulate the Republican leader, Mr. LONGWORTH, who still is the House leader, and has not been overridden by Mellon plan advocates, but is supported by the House, and I congratulate my friends on the Democratic side who helped, practically unanimously, to put through the former tax bill, which bill has been here adopted with slight modifications. All these, with the conferees, deserve credit for the bill before us. And I say to my Republican colleagues it is not necessary, but I thank you for what you have done, because I believe you now appreciate the bill here agreed to and reported is for the best interest of the country. It reduces the taxes of the small taxpayer over 60 per cent and gives some relief to all.

I call attention to the gentleman who said, "You are wrecking this bill." The gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] previously declared the bill to be unworkable and denounced it on the floor. Seven comrades were with him as against 408 who supported the measure when the bill passed the House before. We have also been told for months that the bill before us would cause a great Treasury deficit. Mr. Mellon was quoted in the press constantly to that effect. He knowingly or ignorantly repeated the statement so often the country came to believe it to be true. It was untrue. You were told by Mr. Mellon that it would cause a deficit of $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 annually, that it could not safely be passed, and yet, as we have been repeatedly advised by Chairman GREEN of the committee as late as this morning, and by Senator SMOOT, in charge of the bill over in the Senate, that there can be a tax reduction of over $400,000,000 annually as provided in the bill, and also it will permit the passage of the $2,000,000,000 soldiers' bonus bill and leave a Treasury balance over all. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will; certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Some of the papers have carried the statement it would create a deficit of $600,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. Unquestionably, nothing was too wild and false for irresponsible Mellon tax agencies in order to put over the sale of the Mellon plan to the public. Many millions of dollars were spent in propaganda for that discredited plan. Yet, as a matter of fact, the Mellon plan was prepared we know not when nor where nor how, but in the interest of a comparative handful of people of large wealth out of the 6,000,000 income taxpayers that this bill will relieve. I can name half a dozen people—the chairman of this committee, Judge GREEN; the distinguished Republican leader, Mr. LONGWORTH; the leader of the Democratic side, Mr. GARNER; Mr. HULL of Tennessee; and gentlemen in the Senate, like Senator SIMMONS, and others who are tax experts with years of experience equal to any in the country who agree to this bill. All tax experts surely equal to the gentleman who presides over the Treasury Department, Secretary Mellon, who now tells Congress what we shall do and what we shall not do. "You must pass it as written by me; you must pass my bill; you can not pass the soldiers' bonus bill; you can not pass a bill for the relief of the soldiers or taxpayers except the Mellon plan," that was his command in plain English, but we have rejected the Mellon rates because they were unjust and unfair and in the interest of men of great wealth to the exclusion of the great masses. Gentlemen, I submit that the Congress of the United States has some powers of its own that it will exercise. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we sat here at the beginning of the session while we were denounced by gentlemen on my left with statements that we were irregular because we saw before us the situation presented to-day. It was said that we were independent. Yes, we were. We were trying to secure a needed liberalization of the rules of the House. [Applause.] Members had sat here for years gagged and tied and could not vote any amendments to bills. There was put through the House last session the 1921 revenue bill carrying over $3,500,000,000 without a single amendment being permitted to be offered. It repealed the excess-profits tax of $450,000,000, and no vote was permitted on that great item. We cut down the surtax in committee $50,000,000 in that bill and you sat here handcuffed, bound, and gagged, and could only vote on the bill as reported from the committee. We as self-respecting Members resented that indefensible practice and we refused to consent to it longer. On this side independent Republicans were for liberalizing the rules so that amendments could be offered the same as in the Senate. This bill before us is the result of amendments placed in the committee bill by the House. [Applause.]

For the first time in recent history the House has written a tax bill. Heretofore the Senate has written the tax bill. It is common knowledge that the Senate claimed it wrote all important bills, and the press so stated with much truth. To-day you have come into your own, and if we have done nothing more I can say we have done nothing better in the history of this Congress when to-day the House has assumed its constitutional functions. [Applause.]

The gentleman who sits in the Treasury Department at the other end of the Avenue has denounced us repeatedly and has advised the chief administrative officer over in the White House what to do. He has told the President, and constantly told you, that we could not pass a bonus bill and a tax bill in this session of Congress. You must make your choice he declared where he opposed the bonus bill. Through the press we have been repeatedly told what he intended Congress should do about taxes and the soldiers' bonus. What a wonderful seer he has been. He had better hereafter confine his duties to the administration of the law.

We will attend to the legislation, and we can do it with full information and better understanding of the subject. If he is opposed, as he says he is, to the bonus bill, which we passed over the President's veto; if he is opposed to this tax bill, which gives relief of $400,000,000 annually to 6,000,000 taxpayers, as he says he is, and if he can not administer it fairly and justly, he ought to resign and let some one be placed in the Treasury who can and who will. [Applause.] We need some one who has an understanding and some sympathy for the ex-soldiers, the general public, and the legislative branch of the Government. The people of this country are tired of having one man in the Treasury Department telling the American Congress, as well as the President, constantly what we must do. Have we no rights and no responsibilities at all? Gentlemen, under the Constitution this House has the sole right, the sole power, to inaugurate legislation, and yet we had a bill placed upon our desks by Secretary Mellon at the beginning of the session, and from the beginning to the present day practically every paper in the country controlled by favored interests or which could be controlled denounced us because we would not pass the Mellon plan, which the Secretary demanded. Well, we have passed it up, and the bill before us is better many times for the country as a whole and will be overwhelmingly passed by the House, as it was by the Senate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take the time of the House unnecessarily, but I say that the House of Representatives to-day has before it a tax bill which ought to be approved by the House and by the President. I would have had more publicity to insure needed legislation, and I would like to have a graduated tax on corporations. We ought to have both; but this bill is so infinitely better than the existing law or the Mellon tax bill that it ought to be passed practically unanimously. It is immaterial to me whether the bill is vetoed by the President like the bonus bill, as threatened, or not. If so, we will pass it over any veto. I believe we have a constitutional duty to perform, and we have now come to the final act. Let us pass the bill irrespective of party lines quickly and unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, in this solemn hour, when the Mellon bill is hanging in the balance, I consulted the oracle at the foot of Mount Parnassus as to its fate and received this enigmatical reply, entitled:

ODE TO A MELLON

When first thou wert seen
Thou wert quite a melon—
So fresh and so green—
With so pleasant a smell on;
But wert not so long worth
Face value, or nearly,
Tho' MILLS tried to save thee,
And FREAR tried to shear thee.
When GARNER had garnered thee
Wert cured of thine ills,
But came out a LONGWORTH
Quite stripped of thy frills.
As flat as a pancake,
Not at all like a Mellon,
Unhappiest halfbake
That eyes ever fell on.

Then away to the Senate
Thy troubles near ended;
There doomed for thine "altimate"
Whilst hung there suspended.
Amidst the press rappings
Wert given some "trimmin's"
And stripped of thy trappings
By Senator SIMMONS.

Now the question that irks us
Is what thou wilt be
When thou comest from conference
On Mr. GREEN'S knee!
Will they spank thee and yank thee
And lay thee prostrate,
GARNER thee nicely
With rates and a date—
Topped off with persimmons
Upon a tin plate—
And hand thee to Coolidge
In elegant state?

[Laughter and applause.]

That fairly describes the legislative history of the Mellon bill up to this good hour.

But it has had a career entirely aside from the tribulations it has gone through in Congress.

No public measure in recent times has provoked more controversy or aroused so great a propaganda in its behalf.

When the Mellon plan was proposed it was characterized as a tax-reduction measure. That, of course, had a euphonious and welcome sound, and, even before knowing the details of the plan, there was a general chorus of public approval. Chambers of commerce, trade and industrial organizations hailed it with loud acclamation.

When the bill was finally prepared, under the supervision of Mr. Mellon, it was found to be a document of nearly 300 pages containing many intricate provisions.

It was then revealed for the first time that the gist of Mr. Mellon's scheme of tax reduction was to cut, with one fell blow of the ax, 50 per cent from the taxes of persons in the so-called upper brackets—that is, taxpayers deriving incomes in excess of $25,000 per year—while it only reduced the taxes of the little fellows about 25 per cent.

Notwithstanding this invidious distinction in the bestowal of tax reduction—perhaps on account of that unfair discrimination—the chorus of approval rang out more loudly than ever. The men of big incomes, who were to be benefited, saw their opportunity to scrimp fading away, and immediately inaugurated a propaganda through the medium of every art known to the new and ingenious "science of publicity."

There were just 39,915 persons in the United States whose incomes were above $25,000 per year, while there were 6,195,312 taxpayers whose incomes were under that figure.

But among the 39,915 were to be found the big financial, commercial, and industrial elements of the Nation. They would benefit most by the Mellon plan, and I presume it was natural enough for them to be swayed by their own selfish interest. They had the press at their disposal—they are heavy advertisers. That is how newspapers are bribed and public opinion prostituted. Those who ought to have told the truth—that being the chief essential of their calling—deliberately kept the truth hidden or garbled the facts so as to mislead over 6,000,000 people into the belief that their interests would be best promoted by reducing the taxes on big incomes 50 per cent and reducing taxes on little incomes 25 per cent.

For instance, a person having an income of $5,000 per year, now paying a tax of $100, would have his tax reduced $25, or 25 per cent, while a person with a $100,000 income had his tax reduced from $30,140 to $19,840—a saving of $10,300, or over 30 per cent.

But it was in the higher incomes that the discrimination was most pronounced. For instance, the multimillionaires drawing an income of $1,000,000 per year, were presented with a tax bonus of $250,000.

The so-called Garner plan took this invidious and unfair discrimination into account and, by a graduated surtax up to 44 per cent, attempting to apportion the benefits of tax reduction, so that the people of small incomes would derive some material benefit. This was called the Democratic plan and is set out in the following table, which shows, by the "deadly parallel," just what the Mellon plan would do to or for the small taxpayers:

This comparative table shows the total tax payable by a married person without dependents

Income	Present law tax	Mellon plan tax	Democratic plan tax
$3,000	$20	$15

$94,000	26,900	18,040	23,430
$100,000	30,140	19,840	26,430

Then came the critical moment when the courage of Congress was to be tested. They stood the test. They were not "panicked" into slavish submission to newspaper domination.

Both sides of the aisle got together and without partisanship agreed on the so-called Longworth compromise, making the maximum surtax 37½ per cent.

Then the bill went to the Senate, where the Longworth compromise was rejected and the maximum rates put at 40 per cent.

Of course, the newspaper clamor continued and will perhaps continue until the President signs the bill. Then the clamor will cease, and those who have been fathering the propaganda will laugh up their sleeves and take the benefactions of the conference bill without further grumbling.

I do not want to close without pointing out a serious flaw in the reasoning of the Mellon bill advocates. That flaw is due to a difference in the methods of comparison between the Mellon bill and its substitute.

It is only candid to say that there are two methods of comparison and we will have to leave to the individual conscience the logic and ethics of the respective methods.

In my analysis I have maintained that if there is any reduction in taxes all grades of taxpayers should be proportionally benefited.

The friends of the Mellon plan hold that it is unfair to tax the rich man 40 per cent of his income while taxing the poor man only 1 per cent.

At first blush this would seem a reasonable objection; but it invokes a theory of comparison utterly at variance with all recognized systems of taxation, and particularly that system which we were compelled to adopt to meet the exigencies of the war.

Thus, it errs in confusing "surtaxes" with "taxes." The 40 per cent income tax complained of is a surtax and not a tax.

In the lower grades or brackets all incomes are treated alike. On the first $10,000 of income the millionaire pays exactly the same percentage as any other wage earner. He pays neither more nor less than his humblest neighbor.

When, however, the taxpayer begins to draw a higher income above $10,000 per year, he begins to pay what is called a "surtax."

The surtax begins at 1 per cent on earnings above $10,000 and increases gradually as the surplus earnings increase. When that surplus, above the normal $10,000, reaches $25,000 he is required to pay a surtax of about 10 per cent; but that surtax is imposed only on the excess earnings above $10,000.

On all below the $10,000 he pays exactly the same as any other taxpayer.

The theory of the surtax is that those who profited by the war, or who continue to profit out of the economic plight of the country, should be willing to give up a part of their excess earnings in order to maintain the Government which fosters and protects them.

If they do not like to make this contribution, they can cease making these annoying excess profits by sharing them with the consumers of the land and lowering by so much the high cost of living.

The bill as now presented is a fair compromise, and I intend to vote for the conference report, which will have the effect of enacting it into law, if it receives, as I believe it ought to, the Executive approval.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. In consideration of a conference report, the merits of the original bill are not actually a factor. The question to-day is a comparison between this bill (H. R. 6715) as it passed the House and as it passed the Senate. I desire, therefore, to call attention to a few of the points of difference between the two bodies and the final action of the conferees.

The most far-reaching amendment in which the House receded was the adoption of the Senate normal and surtax rates rather than the rates as adopted by the House. The Senate bill will produce less revenue from surtaxes; the House would have produced less on normal tax. The net loss by adoption of the Senate provision is about $15,000,000.

The major concessions on the part of the Senate conferees, however, made at the insistence of the House conferees, were, to my mind, of very much greater importance. The method of computing capital gains and losses, allowing 12½ per cent for each, was a distinct advantage for the House conferees. If the Senate provision had been adopted, full losses on capital assets could have been charged off and the Government would thus have lost large sums.

Another major provision upon which the House insisted was the removal of the so-called Jones amendment taxing corporate gains on a sliding scale similar to that in the estate and gift taxes. The inclusion of this tax into as high brackets as was necessary to secure equal revenue with the House bill would have totally destroyed opportunity for expansion of business by corporations, as the rates were prohibitive.

To tax profits simply because they were not distributed and prevent their use in business would absolutely curtail enterprise and development.

The adoption of the House system of an estate tax rather than an inheritance tax was another marked victory for the House conferees.

A great deal has been said about the publicity of income-tax returns. In my opinion the House bill offered as much opportunity for publicity of returns as was consistent with furnishing information to those having right of access. The Senate amendment made the lists absolutely public property. The House conferees agreed to an amendment to their provision whereby the amount of the income tax paid should be included on the published lists.

I was personally opposed to the item as passed by the House, but I think the House item went as far as it was necessary to go in providing information through the channels where it was rightfully to be had. [Applause.] However, in order to secure an agreement with the Senate it was necessary to add the provision whereby the total amount of individual tax reports should be made public. That is not a serious drawback, and it will not convey information beyond the scope of what may be rightfully known. If, however, the Senate provision for complete publicity had been agreed to, we would have had a saturnalia of inquisitorial publicity, used either for blackmailing, revenge, or for the gratification of pure Yankee inquisitiveness.

The item to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] has referred is not, in my opinion, quite as serious as he has stated it. It is true we accepted a provision making all contested cases of assessments of $10,000 or over a matter of court record, but is it not fair to assume that if there is a dispute to the extent of $10,000 between the taxpayer and the Government it is sufficiently large to have the information made in the form of a report and actual court proceedings held? The board of 28 men can function and will function very materially for the benefit of the taxpayers. The provision that the House conferees removed whereby the 21 men who leave the board at the end of the two-year period could not appear before the board of appeals as counsel was a very wise removal of a serious drawback to the functioning of the board. I therefore think the board will be of direct benefit to the taxpayer and to the general public. [Applause.]

These are, very briefly, the main points of difference adjudicated in conference. On the whole, it seems to me the bill is very materially improved. I do not hesitate to say I could not have voted for the bill as passed by the Senate, but I shall support the present bill. My reasons briefly are:

It is a much better bill than the Senate sent to conference.

It is a tax-reduction measure, and it will afford some relief to the people.

The administrative features are materially better than the present law.

There are fewer loopholes for escaping taxation.

I still object to the bill, however, on the general ground that it is not in conformity with the recommendations of the administration, and that it will not be as beneficial to general business as the original bill.

It is not as good a bill as the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee reported to this body, but it is a better bill than the present law, and it is the best bill this Congress will pass under existing circumstances, where the membership of both branches is such that there is no party responsibility.

I take exception to the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, my good friend Mr. FREAR, wherein he asserts that 21 so-called independent radicals are the people who have written the good legislation in this Congress. You can not write legislation in that way, my friends, and the poor features of this tax bill are the result of the very sort of thing in which the gentleman from Wisconsin takes such great pride.

I shall vote for the conference report. If the President in his examination of the bill finds that its deficiencies offset its merits and vetoes the measure, I shall certainly support him in such action. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I can not get the same degree of satisfaction out of this conference report that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has expressed, and not even quite so much as my good friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

True, the conferees on the part of the House did some good work and deserve the gratitude of the country for it. The bill is nothing like so objectionable, in my judgment, as it was when it left the Senate. However, most of the defects that were in it when it left the House are still in it and some additional ones have been added. I did not feel justified in voting for the bill when it passed the House and I can not bring myself now, although it has reached a later stage, to vote to accept the conference report with its additional objectionable features, such as the publicity feature. The conference report should be rejected, a new conference with the Senate asked, and the conferees on the part of the House should insist upon the disagreement to the Senate action without amendment.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I hope that my friend will excuse me, as I have only three minutes and can not say all that I wish to say in so short a time.

So, regardless of the state we have reached, it seems to me that in view of the fact that there is no way in which we can vote to recommit this bill with instructions and that there is no way in which we can protest against the objectionable features that have been added, the only means left by which we can voice a protest is to vote against the whole conference report, and therefore I shall not hesitate to do it. If the conference report should be voted down a new conference may be asked for and new instructions given to the House conferees.

I consider the publicity feature a very serious matter. It can not be defended upon any ground of public interest. It is an unwarranted, entirely unnecessary violation of the right of privacy in private affairs, the rights of the public being fully protected by the Treasury Department under the present laws. It is more than this; it will be a constant menace to the peace of the community and to the security and safety of the people. While serving no useful purpose whatever, it will lend convenient aid to the tongue of the meddlesome busybody, the pen of the blackmailer, and to the hand of the kidnaper.

The board of appeals as first proposed would have proved a great convenience and relief to the taxpayer and a valuable adjunct to the Treasury. The bill as agreed to by the conferees will probably make entirely unworkable this very valuable feature of the bill.

I am not satisfied that the bill as it now stands will produce sufficient revenue beyond the first fiscal year. The first year, the law being in full operation only one-half of the time, it will probably bring in enough revenue to meet the expenses, but beyond that neither the chairman of the committee nor anyone else has explained how it can fail to produce a deficit thereafter.

Gentlemen, we lost a great opportunity when we failed to pass the bill usually referred to as the Mellon bill, which the Ways and Means Committee brought into this House. It was founded on sound scientific taxation principles. It was a bill that undertook to reform our income-tax system. It would have brought about a considerable measure of genuine tax reform. It would have put our tax laws upon a basis that would have been beneficial to all the people alike. Instead of that, this bill at best only reduces the taxes of a few moderately well-to-do people, but leaves what will prove to be, as it has in the past, an oppressive burden of taxation upon productive enterprise, which ultimately means the other 107,000,000 people whom the reductions in this bill do not and can not reach. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I fear I am suffering with such a cold I can not use my two minutes either to your benefit or to my own satisfaction.

I wish to record myself as opposed to the adoption of the conference report. My views are ably presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS], and I concur in the conclusions which he has stated. [Applause.]

This is a pernicious bill in a number of particulars, and it is fraught with evil and peril, so that the business community will suffer from it until they clamor for its repeal.

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yields back one minute.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I voted for this bill as it passed the House of Representatives, having previously voted consistently for all of the provisions of the Mellon plan as they were offered; but I shall vote against this conference report, and I hope the President will veto the bill because of certain things that have been done since this bill left the House of Representatives, and thus by his veto cause the elimination of certain of its provisions.

I agree with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLS] said, with what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON[said, with what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] said, and, gentlemen, I want to watch the faces of the Members of this House when next year the list of your personal incomes is published.

Already newspapers are preparing to publish the pittances we pay to the Government as income-tax returns. Already the Paul Prys of this Nation are curious to know how much the individual Members of the House pay, as well as what their next-door neighbors pay. I am against government by Paul Pryism.

The tendency at the present time is for the Government to stick its fingers into the private life of every individual. I voted for this bill, as the best we could then get, when it passed this House; but as a protest, if nothing more, against this publicity feature I shall vote against this conference report, and I hope others will vote against it with me. There is nothing sacred in a conference report, and this one should go back to conference for further consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has used 30 minutes and has 15 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Texas has used 17 minutes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I am for this conference report.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the country is clamoring for relief from taxes, and I do not anticipate this bill or any bill that the Congress of the United States could pass is quite going to satisfy the people on the question of the reduction of taxes. I think the people for the moment forget that the burden of their taxes does not rest in the taxes paid into the Treasury of the United States but goes for the conduct of their domestic and home affairs. I know in my State, which I have the honor in part to represent, we pay a per capita tax into the Federal Treasury of only $7, while for local affairs, for our State government and county government and municipal government and for our school government, we pay between $60 and $70 per capita. I do not think in other States the proportion is quite so great, but I am sure this bill will not bring to the people the relief they think they will get; and yet I think it will bring to them more relief than any other bill that has been proposed during the present Congress.

A concerted effort has been made to make the people believe that no reduction of taxes could be had unless Congress passed the Mellon bill. Probably not in the history of the Government has there been such a campaign carried on by the Treasury Department and the rich people of the country, who control the metropolitan press, to mislead the people on the question of tax legislation, and that campaign could have but one purpose in view, and that was to induce the Congress to pass a law in the interests of the people who were spending their money in that propaganda.

This bill as it now comes from the conference is practically the Garner bill as it appeared in the House. It was first alleged the bill would not reduce taxes as much as the Mellon plan; when the bill was passed and went to the Senate the spokesman for the administration set up the cry that if the bill became a law it would create a deficit and the Government could not run on the revenue produced by it. This morning we are advised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] that under the bill there would be a handsome surplus this year and a surplus of $138,000,000 next year after the expenses for the bonus for that year have been paid. These figures, the chairman of the committee assures us, were furnished him this morning by the actuary of the Treasury Department.

Mr. Speaker, one of the lamentable things about the tax question is the unreliability of the statements given out by the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject. The American people have a right to be furnished fair, just, and accurate information upon a question so vital as that of taxes. They surely, however, can not have much faith in the accuracy of information given them by the Secretary of the Treasury when one considers the many inaccurate statements given out during the past two years.

Less than two years ago President Harding vetoed the soldier bonus bill because he was advised by the Secretary of the Treasury that there would be a deficit for that year of more than $600,000,000. When the year closed the same Secretary of the Treasury gave to the public a statement that there was not a deficit but a surplus of $325,000,000. When this Congress convened the country was told by the Secretary of the Treasury that the only way in which taxes might be reduced would be the passage of the Mellon bill, and that it would be impossible to reduce taxes if a soldiers' bonus bill was passed. Now, the Congress has passed a soldiers' bonus bill and refused to pass the Mellon bill, and the actuary from the Treasury Department informs us that the bill which we will this day pass will reduce taxes more than $400,000,000 a year and still leave a surplus in the Treasury. It is little short of criminal, Mr. Speaker, that the American people are deceived by their constituted authorities on questions so vital to them, and it is but little less reprehensible that the privileged class who control the press of this country should poison the minds of the people by carrying to them false information about their Government.

For weeks and months the metropolitan press of the country has been filled with criticism for Congress on the question of tax legislation—not because the Congress was not proceeding to reduce taxes but because it hesitated about passing the Mellon bill which had been drawn in secret and thrown into this House with the course demand that it be passed without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." To the credit of the Congress and the American people this body exercised its constitutional function of initiating revenue laws and to-day we will pass this bill regardless of the wishes of Mr. Mellon or any other spokesman for special privilege.

Mr. Speaker, special privilege seems to be in the saddle in this country, and I hope it is riding for a fall. This country never saw a more brazen attempt at the intimidation of the Congress than has been carried on in the recent months by big business, special interests, and their spokesmen. The Literary Digest recently quoted Judge Gary, of the Steel Trust, as saying:

> The worst thing we have is our American Congress—

And Mr. Orrin Lester, of the Bowery Savings Bank of New York, as saying:

> With such agencies at work in the country as Bolshevism and the present United States Congress we have some job on our hands to maintain the integrity of the Nation and the security of her institutions.

These gentlemen are angry because Congress has not been subservient and obeyed orders. They are not angry because we did not reduce taxes, but they are angry because the Congress would not pass the Mellon bill, when they and the whole world knew the bill was written in the interests of the rich and against the interests of the average taxpayer.

Mr. Speaker, the age-old fight goes on; the demand for power and privilege is insatiable; it is not confined to any nation or any State—it exists in Europe as it exists in America; it exists in Montana as it exists in New York and every other State in the Union—and the legislator, whether State or national, who condemns it is called a charletan, a demagogue, a faker, or worse. If he attempts to equalize taxes and make the rich and special-privileged class pay their share, he is lashed by the press, controlled by these same interests, and, if possible, driven from public office.

The passage of this bill should be notice that the American people demand that special privilege shall keep its hands from the legislative bodies, and should be notice that the people demand that those who have heretofore avoided and evaded their just share of taxes shall do so no longer, and that people and not special privilege must rule in State and Nation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have given very careful consideration to the provisions of this bill as contained in the conference report, especially from the standpoint of efficiency. I am convinced of two things: First, that it is a workable bill and will greatly reduce the losses to the Treasury through the loopholes of escape now open in the law, materially reduce taxation to the taxpayers, improve the administrative provisions of the law, and that it will provide adequate funds for the conduct of the business of the Government. [Applause.] I have not the time in two minutes to state the ground or figures or computations upon which these conclusions are based, but of the correctness of these conclusions I am confident.

I hope no Member of the House will be misled concerning the publication of the amount of money paid by any taxpayer. Under the present law the collector posts in his office a list of the names and addresses and amounts of refunds paid, and also the names and addresses of those who pay taxes. We added one additional thing, so that he will post in his office the taxes paid by each taxpayer as well as the refunds made. It was that or all the records of the Government would be open to the widest investigation and publicity, so that every return would be open to those who desired to learn the business methods and plans of any taxpayer. Such inspection would not affect beneficially the collector of taxes, but would prove a source of serious injury.

I wish to say one thing concerning the tax board appeals. It has been stated that it would be a board greatly handicapped by the provision contained in the conference report. I believe the House provision is the better. When originally proposed the board was to consist of 28 members for two years, but after that period the Treasury thought that 7 members would be all that were necessary. The board is to be segregated into divisions consisting of 3 members each, which will then make nine separate bodies who will consider and determine the questions before them on appeal. Since only cases involving a dispute of $10,000 or more are to be of record, this will greatly diminish the number of cases in which records must be made, as provided in the conference report, as it will affect only revenues of $50,000 or over. I think the provision is workable and that the board can dispatch the business before it in a reasonable time. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair kindly notify me when I have occupied three minutes? Mr. Speaker, the American Congress, in answer to the charge that it was not willing to reduce taxation, will shortly present to the people of the United States a bill that will reduce taxes on individual and corporate incomes $232,000,000 and excise taxes $56,000,000 this calendar year [applause], about $400,000,000 the next calendar year, and over $400,000,000 the following calendar year. [Applause.] In taking these figures, it should be kept in mind that the calendar year is different from the fiscal year.

We bring to the American people a bill which I believe—in fact, am satisfied—is more scientific than any other bill ever presented in the history of this country since we began the heavy taxation which has been made necessary by the war.

For the first time we have put estate taxes on a scientific basis, where every estate throughout the whole breadth of the country will pay the same tax on a like amount. We have made the income tax so light on the smaller taxpayers that no man who does not have an income greater than $10,000 has any reason to complain about the amount he pays to the Federal Government. We have given to the American people this great reduction without levying any unjust burden upon anyone. We have brought to the Nation a bill that upon its final examination, when the people understand all its provisions, I believe will receive the fullest commendation from the taxpayers of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this bill has been utterly misrepresented in the propaganda that has gone out against it, but the American taxpayer will learn the truth when he makes his next income-tax return.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, my genial friend from Texas has complained because I reversed my position on the bonus. Well, so did he. [Laughter and applause.] But the gentleman had already been guilty of an inconsistency of which I never could be charged. He has voted both ways on the tariff. Certainly I have never reversed myself on that. [Laughter and applause.]

Some of you, my colleagues, may remember that the first time I took the floor, a day or so after I had been honored by election as the leader of this side of the House, I stated that in my judgment an opportunity was offered us at this session of Congress to put the House of Representatives back on the legislative map. [Applause.] I made the confident prediction that we would do it, and I am proud to say that it has been done, and that to-day the House of Representatives is the dominant body in the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

We not only have legislated, but we know how to legislate and how to carry out a program, and we have carried our legislative program so far and so consistently that I say to you, without any possible fear of contradiction, that this House will be ready to adjourn on the 7th of June. [Applause.] If by any chance an adjournment is not taken then, it will not be the fault of any of us here.

If I may be pardoned another personal allusion, during the process of consideration of this bill and afterwards I was considerably criticized for what was termed "spineless leadership," because, forsooth, I did not insist that, so far as I was concerned, we were to have the Treasury tax bill or nothing. I thought then and I think now that it would have been mighty poor leadership to have taken that position. [Prolonged applause.] It seemed to me that no one who had in mind the experience of Congress in the last session in tax reduction, and particularly with the action of the Senate, could think it possible, even if desirable, to reduce the high surtaxes 50 per cent at one fell swoop. It could not be done, gentlemen [applause], particularly if you only reduced the normal taxes 25 per cent. [Applause.]

Out of approximately 175 Members upon this side of the House who had voted last year for 32 per cent, only to be overridden by the Senate, 73 of them did not come back to the Congress, and there was a nucleus of only 100 men returned to the House that could be confidently relied upon to vote for 32 per cent or possibly 25 per cent. I felt it my duty, in so far as my party leadership was concerned, to try if at all possible to unite my party on this question [applause], and I think that course is justified by what we have seen of the actions of another body. There is not a particle of question, gentlemen, that had we insisted upon the Treasury plan or nothing, we would to-day be voting on the Garner plan or worse. [Laughter and applause.]

The bill before us to-day in its essentials is practically identical with the bill as it passed the House. The changes in the taxes on incomes are so insignificant that it seems almost farcical to have gone through the motions they did in the Senate. The conferees agreed on the Senate income-tax rates, but for all practical purposes they might just as well have agreed on the House rates. For instance, the Senate rate on the first $4,000 of income was 2 per cent, and the House rate 2 per cent. On incomes between $4,000 and $8,000 the Senate rate was 4 per cent and the House 5 per cent. Above $8,000 the Senate rate was 6 per cent and the House the same. From then up to incomes of $200,000 the difference between the House and Senate rates varied not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent. Take for instance the typical incomes on $10,000, the Senate rate was 1 per cent and the House rate 1½ per cent; on $50,000 the Senate rate was 17 per cent and the House 17½ per cent; on $100,000 the Senate rate was 37 per cent and the House 36½ per cent; on $200,000 the Senate rate was 38 per cent and the House 37½ per cent. Above that point in the House there was no increase of the rates, but the Senate went as high as 40 per cent on incomes of $500,000 and above. In other words, the actual difference is so insignificant that it seemed hardly worth while to take all the time and trouble that was taken in the Senate to attempt to acquire authorship of these rates, and I don't think that the country will be fooled upon this proposition.

I have a good deal of sympathy for my friend from Texas, for where, oh where, is the Garner plan, the child of his brain? I thought at the beginning that this bill ought to have been made a nonpartisan measure. I so acted in the beginning, but my friend from Texas, who is first a statesman and then a politician, sometimes gets so energetic in the latter capacity that he outstrips himself in the former. [Laughter and applause.] So he sat down and he figured out a surtax of 44 per cent. There is no conceivable reason for 44 per cent unless it is based on the first two prime requisites for 44, 4 and 11 [laughter]; no earthly reason for it, but the gentleman from Texas refused to even discuss the question of any change from that 44 per cent. I said to him, "There is no fetish in 44 per cent." He said, "Well, the trouble about it is that I have been so successful in selling my plan to my party and to the country that I would not be justified in changing that figure." He said, "It would not be fair to the great party for which I am the spokesman or to the people of America whom I have the honor to represent."

Therefore we had to go ahead on this side and write a sensible tax bill that would raise the necessary revenue. [Applause.] We did so without inviting any assistance from that side of the House. That is all I have to say, gentlemen. I am ready to vote on this proposition. I think it is a fair and just tax bill. It may have some defects that I would prefer to have remedied, but the general proposition to reduce the tax by 50 per cent on the little fellow and 25 per cent on the big fellow can be justified anywhere in America. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The quesction was taken; and there were—yeas 377, nays 9, not voting 47, as follows:

REVENUE ACT OF 1924

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the tax bill as now reported by the conference and which is now before us is a splendid, constructive, scientific tax measure. It is not the opinion of any one individual. The bill is the result of months of serious study by tax experts in the House and Senate, and has the approval, I am certain, of the majority Members of both branches of Congress. This bill was approved by the Senate on Saturday last by an overwhelming vote. When the bill left the House it received the affirmative vote of 408, while only 8 votes were recorded against it. I predict that this conference report will be approved by this House by an overwhelming vote and that it will soon be on its way to the White House. I consider this bill a real, equitable tax reduction bill. May I be pardoned for taking a bit of personal pride in the bill? Some of the features that are now in the bill were originally sponsored by the progressives of this House.

Our efforts commenced when we fought for a modification of the rule, which it must be admitted resulted in the possibility of offering amendments to this bill, as was pointed out by my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin, one of the best tax experts in Congress, the Hon. JAMES A. FREAR. Had there not been difference of opinion on the income-tax schedule, I venture to state that in all likelihood there would not have been much discussion and debate on the bill.

The schedule on income tax presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, which was first advertised throughout the country as the only scientific tax bill, as the only hope of saving the country, as the real panacea to promote and develop business, was first presented to this Congress, with an ultimatum to take the schedule which became known as the Mellon plan and not to make the slightest change. The progressive group gave this important measure the careful study that it gives every important measure upon which we take a stand. I am happy, and may I be pardoned if I say proud, to-day to see that the result of the labor of our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], and individual members of the progressive group and the suggestions which we brought before the House and offered to our colleague in the way of amendments, the spirit of cooperation and the willingness of the progressive group to do everything to assist in the drafting of a real constructive measure, regardless of whose name it may bear or who might receive the credit, has resulted in the bill which has been passed by the House and Senate and which will be approved to-day. Gentlemen, the bill as it stands to-day is the living proof that the progressive Republicans of the House are not obstructionists, are not selfish, but are rendering real useful service and are cooperating in the fullest sense of the word with our colleagues on this side of the House and, if necessary, on the other side of the House as well for the sole purpose of rendering useful public service.

It is now history that when it seemed this House was in a deadlock on this bill after many hours of general debate, after the bill had been read under the five-minute rule and amendments were adopted, and on the eve of the final vote the progressive group came forward with a compromise, sacrificing some of the features which we had hoped to write into law, offered the majority of this House a schedule of income-tax rates which represented a substantial reduction and yet maintaining the purpose and spirit of an income tax law, and dividing the reduction in an equitable manner, with the least reduction on those best able to pay and who derive the greatest benefit from the Government. May I at this time read a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury which I wrote on February 20, 1924:

Hon. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: You are by this time convinced. I am sure, that there is a decided difference of opinion in the House as to reduced income-tax rates.

The line-up in the committee and the preliminary skirmish on the floor indicate the attitude of the House toward this very important measure. It is time, I venture to say, for complete and frank statement as to the condition of the Treasury. Every honest and sincere friend of the bonus, as well as declared opponent, must admit that the bonus question and tax reduction can not be separated. They must be considered together.

It has been repeatedly stated that your tax-reduction plan reported by the majority of the committee did not allow sufficient resources out of which to pay the bonus. It is likewise charged that the rate schedule adopted yesterday will not raise sufficient funds.

We have had a flood of conclusions and a dearth of actual figures.

Considering the present situation and the overwhelming sentiment in the House in favor of a bonus, will you be good enough to inform me, regardless of your personal feeling toward the bonus, the maximum tax reduction possible, assuming that a bonus is to be paid our ex-service men and women? To be specific, will a 2 per cent and 5 per cent normal tax, respectively, and surtax graduating up to 40 per cent raise sufficient funds which, together with the other revenue of the Government, will permit the paying of a bonus along the lines of the bill passed by the last Congress and vetoed by the President? If not, what rate will do it?

A definite official statement, with figures, from you would be of great assistance to a great many of us.

Yours very truly, F. LAGUARDIA.

To this letter I received the following reply, dated February 21, 1924, to which reference was made by the Secretary of the Treasury several times thereafter, the contents of which was known to my colleagues in the House:

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of February 20. I am inclosing herewith Treasury estimates of the effect of my recommendations for tax reduction in the form originally submitted by me to Mr. GREEN, and a statement showing the effect of the Garner plan as originally proposed. In the report of the Ways and Means Committee to the House there appears the estimate by the Treasury of the effect of the tax reduction in the form in which the bill was presented to the House. I may summarize the loss of revenue to the Government under the various plans as follows:

	Mellon plan	Garner plan	Ways and Means Committee recommendations
Personal income	$232,900,000	$511,977,000	$233,400,000
Special taxes	100,000,000	108,040,000	108,040,000
Total	332,900,000	620,017,000	341,440,000

The estimated surplus as appears in the Budget message of the President to Congress for the fiscal year 1924 is $329,639,624 and for the fiscal year 1925, $395,681,634. The estimated cost of the bonus bill in the form vetoed by President Harding is shown in my letter of December 18, 1923, to Representative ANDREW, copy of which is inclosed.

From these figures it is obvious that the bonus can not be paid within the estimated surplus if any of the three plans is adopted, nor would the estimated surplus justify the payment of such a bonus if any of the three plans were changed in the respect of making the normal tax rates 2 per cent and 5 per cent and the surtax rates graduated up to 40 per cent, which are the figures specifically mentioned by you.

You ask me what rate would have to be adopted in order to pay this bonus. You have the estimated figures before you. It is obvious that if all tax reductions be foregone a certain amount of revenue would be available to the Government for such purposes as might be determined. If any plan of tax reduction be adopted and additional taxes of other character be imposed, the effect on the Government revenue could only be determined when the specific nature of the proposed taxes was given. I regret that unless you can present some comprehensive plan by which you propose to raise the necessary money, or in what particular you propose the taxes shall not be reduced, I am unable to give you specific figures.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. F. H. LAGUARDIA,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

His reply, obviously, evaded a direct answer to my inquiry. However, estimates from the Treasury Department quoted to-day by the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. GREEN, and by the senior minority member, Mr. GARNER, and by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. FREAR, contradict the conclusions contained in this letter.

The income-tax rates now before us are substantially those suggested by the progressive group of this House and finally accepted by the majority and maintain what I do not hesitate to say, the social tax feature of the law.

The inheritance tax and gift tax amendments offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and now written into law becomes part of the tax policy of this Republic. I am glad to see that an amendment which I offered and which was accepted in the House preventing members of the board of appeals to practice before the department and its own board within two years after leaving the service has been retained in the bill. I do not share the fears expressed by one or two gentlemen who have addressed the House to-day of the great danger of the tax-return publicity features contained in the bill. I believe that the publicity features as contained in the bill are wholesome, are necessary, and while it may cause embarrassment and inconvenience, perhaps, to an individual here and there, it is for the good of all the taxpayers and the protection of all the honest taxpayers. No fault can seriously be found in the provision which requires the proceedings of the board of appeals to be public. Let us be frank about that. The purpose of the board of appeals is to afford a taxpayer who complains against his assessment the opportunity of a hearing and to show cause why his taxes should be reduced or payment made owing to overassessment should be refunded. The board of appeals and the publicity placed upon its activities are the result of the vicious secrecy system which has grown up in the Treasury Department under the present law.

We hear of enormous refunds being made—we know of certain cases where refunds were made—and yet the law to-day is such that it is impossible to obtain any facts or figures to ascertain why refunds were made and to whom. The provision, therefore, in the present bill making public the proceedings of this board is the inevitable result of providing the remedy for curing an existing evil.

A great deal of propaganda has been broadcast throughout this country on this measure. I venture the statement that there has been more misinformation officially sent out concerning this bill than has ever been sent out on any question in the history of this country. Letters, resolutions, official statements, moving-picture propaganda, paid advertisements, and organized protests have been marshaled in making the people of this country believe that the Mellon tax bill would save the country—would bring real tax reduction—and that any other plan was destructive, would create a deficit, and would ruin business. I have had people talk to me against this bill and for the Mellon plan, who were convinced by the arguments furnished them in favor of the Mellon plan, who simply gasped when given the correct figures.

The same brazen effrontery that permitted an official statement to be made a little over two years ago, at the time of the consideration of the bonus bill, that this country would face a deficit of $500,000,000 in 1923–24, and then from the same source a statement in 1923, in support of the Mellon plan, that this country was now blessed with a surplus of over $300,000,000, is an example of the recklessness that statistics and figures were furnished to the American people in support of the Mellon plan and against the bonus.

This tax bill will become known as the congressional tax bill. It is the result of the best thought and careful study of the majority of both Houses of this Congress. This bill reduces the taxes of wage earners, professional men, and small business men 50 per cent. In addition to that, it provides for a further reduction of 25 per cent on earned incomes.

Under the provision of the present law the tax on a married man without dependents, with a net income of $5,000, is 2 per cent of his net income. Secretary Mellon recommended that it be reduced to 1.125 per cent of his net income. The pending act actually reduces the tax to three-fourths of 1 per cent of the net income. Upon a like taxpayer with an income of $10,000 these rates are as follows: Present law, 5.20 per cent; Mellon recommendation, 3.38 per cent; pending act, 2.08 per cent. Upon a like taxpayer with a net income of $3,000 the rates of tax are as follows: Present law, two-thirds of 1 per cent; Mellon plan, thirty-eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent; pending act, one-fourth of 1 per cent.

Taxpayers returning net incomes of less than $10,000 constitute over 97 per cent of all those that make returns for income tax, while about fifteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent of our total population have net incomes in excess of $10,000. A similar taxpayer with a net income of $100,000 would pay the following rates of tax upon his net income: Present law, 30.14 per cent; Mellon plan, 19.82 per cent; pending act, 22.62 per cent.

This shows that while the Mellon plan reduced the tax on the $500,000 man 34 per cent, and the pending act about 25 per cent, the Mellon plan reduced the tax on the $3,000 man fully 43 per cent; on the $5,000 man, 43¾ per cent; and on the $10,000 man 35 per cent, while the pending act reduced these taxes on the $3,000 man 62 per cent; on the $5,000 man 62½ per cent; and on the $10,000 man 60 per cent.

What do these reductions mean? The $3,000-a-year man receives wages at the rate of $57.70 a week. Under the present law his total income tax is a little less than 39 cents a week; the Mellon proposal would have made it a little less than 22 cents a week; the pending bill will make it a little less than 14½ cents per week.

The $5,000 man receives a trifle over $96 a week. His total income tax under the present law is about $1.92½ per week. Under the Mellon plan it would be about $1.08 per week; and under the pending act, about 72 cents per week, a reduction from the Mellon plan of 36 cents per week.

As I have just stated, 97 per cent of the taxpayers earning net incomes less than $10,000, the present bill gives these taxpayers a substantial reduction.

According to the last available figures from the Treasury Department, we find that there are just 21 taxpayers whose yearly incomes are over $1,000,000 each, and in the next bracket there are just 84 taxpayers whose yearly incomes are over $500,000 each. Therefore, it would seem that all of this clamor, all of this protest has been inspired, encouraged, and paid for in the interest of 105 individuals. We are told that if the Mellon plan is not enacted into a law, which particularly favors the 105 multimillionaires, that business will come to a standstill, that there will be no industrial development, that we will have hard times. It is a sad day for America if the commercial and industrial future depends upon the dissatisfaction and personal rancor of 105 men. There is hardly a Member on the floor of this House but that could name the 105 taxpayers. We have heard their names prominently mentioned in the organized campaign of propaganda against our work on this bill. One of them recently made a speech against our very system of government, urging the abolition of Congress unless it happened to be a Congress which he and his money could control. If a speech such as was made by this multimillionaire was made by an alien in this country, he would have been deported as an anarchist in no time. Banks have advertised seeking to create dissension among our people, giving misleading information because they are controlled by these 105 men, and that was part of the propaganda to put through their pet measure sponsored by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Anyone familiar with the industrial and commercial development of this country knows that this country was developed, the big industries created, and the railroads built before we had these multimillionaires. The multimillionaires did not make America. The multimillionaires did not build our railroads and factories and mills and develop our commerce. Not at all. The multimillionaires came after our industries and commerce were founded, established, and developed. The multimillionaires were made by our industries and commerce, not by their own efforts but by the exploitation of the work of the pioneers and the small savings of hundreds of thousands of hard-working Americans. To say that the future prosperity of our country and industrial and business development depends on 105 multimillionaires is to ignore the financial, industrial, and commercial history of America.

It will be indeed unfortunate if the President follows the advice of a few individuals and vetoes this splendid congressional tax bill. It is suggested that it will create an issue. It certainly will. And once the real facts are explained to the American people there is not the slightest doubt as to what the decision will be. It will be very unfortunate, I repeat, if this bill is vetoed, for in all likelihood Congress will accept the challenge and refuse the 25 per cent reduction for the present year, inasmuch as such reduction is contained in the present bill.

It is the function of Congress to fix rates. That is not an Executive function. If the individual viewpoint of Mr. Mellon is accepted and the congressional bill rejected, it will be at the expense of the present and future welfare of the country. Let us hope that the President will approve of this splendid, constructive tax bill.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few observations about this revenue bill which has just passed the Congress and is now the law of the land.

No tax bill was ever written that satisfied everybody who pays the tax. This bill is no exception to the rule, as there are no exceptions to this rule. This bill does not satisfy everybody in the Congress. It is not exactly what any individual Member would have had it. That is just about as impossible to get as a tax bill that would please all those from whom it takes money. With 435 Members of the House and 96 Members of the Senate representing as they do districts and States far apart and interests widely diversified it may well be imagined that there have been strong differences of opinion regarding the merits of several provisions of this bill.

The bill naturally represents the composite ideas of many and is the result of some compromises on several points.

But this bill just passed by the Congress, which will be known as the revenue act of 1924, does reduce taxes by a substantial amount. It will save the people who pay the taxes approximately $472,000,000 next year and more in years to come.

Mr. Mellon asked for the defeat of the soldiers' bonus and a reduction of $323,000,000 in the taxes.

The Congress has worked things out so as to give the soldiers a reasonable and beneficial bonus, payable in 20-year endowment insurance policies, and has reduced the taxes considerably more than Mr. Mellon asked for. And the Congress has gone still further than Mr. Mellon at first suggested by reducing the income tax for 1923 and payable this year by 25 per cent. You will get a credit for 25 per cent of the amount of your income tax shown payable on the return which you should have filed on or before March 15, 1924. This will be a saving of approximately $232,750,000 to the taxpayers of income tax this year.

The elimination and reductions of taxes for the next year and succeeding years is spread out so as to cover and benefit practically every person, young and old, in the land. The tax comes under two general heads—income tax and miscellaneous internal revenue.

On income tax, surtax, earned income, and so forth, the reductions will be about $379,000,000 with a new item of $25,000,000 added on capital losses, making a net saving to the people in this class of taxes of $354,000,000.

The income tax has been reduced substantially and the reductions are relatively greatest to those paying tax on incomes of $10,000 and under.

The present law provides for a normal tax of 4 per cent on the first $4,000 of net income and 8 per cent upon the remainder of net income. The new law provides for a normal tax of 2 per cent upon the first $4,000 net income, then 4 per cent upon the next $4,000 net income, and 6 per cent upon the amount of net income in excess of $8,000. A married man may take an exemption of $2,500 and $400 for each child.

A provision allowing 25 per cent additional reduction from the normal tax on individual incomes earned by personal service will be of benefit to many, especially those who work for wages or salaries—professional men and women and others—where the income is earned through personal activities. This deduction applies to all earned incomes up to $10,000. And all incomes up to $5,000 will be considered as earned and entitled to this 25 per cent deduction anyway. This provision with the reductions in normal and surtax reduces the taxes upon people with incomes under $10,000 very considerably, indeed; to nearly one-third of the former tax, in fact.

The illustrations and comparisons given here between the tax under the old law and the new are figured for a married man without children and taking credit for "earned income" only on the first $5,000. Each child or additional dependent will make an additional deduction, and the man who can establish his entire income up to $10,000 as earned by personal service will have still less to pay.

For example, on an income of $3,000 the tax has been $20. Under this new law it will be $7.50.

On a $4,000 income the tax has been $60. It will now be $22.50.

On a $5,000 income the tax has been $100. It will now be $37.50.

Here is a table for comparison:

Amount of income	Tax under present law	Tax under new law
$3,000	$20.00	$7.50
$4,000	60.00	22.50
$5,000	100.00	37.50
$6,000	160.00	57.50
$7,000	240.00	87.50
$9,000	430.00	167.50
$10,000	520.00	207.50
$12,000	720.00	337.50
$14,000	940.00	477.50
$16,000	1,180.00	657.50
$20,000	1,720.00	1,017.50

On an income of $100,000 the tax has been $30,140. It will now be $22,617.50.

The surtax has been reduced considerably. It will begin at 1 per cent on incomes of from $10,000 to $14,000 and goes gradually up to 40 per cent on incomes in excess of $500,000.

So much for the income tax, which interests usually only those who have an income sufficiently large to be taxed.

Under the title of "Miscellaneous internal revenue" the Government has been collecting $932,784,000. From this list items have been cut out or reduced, saving the people about $134,470,000. These items include the tax on a number of items which most people use and are interested in.

The tax on candy, for instance, has been removed, and this will benefit about every man, woman, and child in the country. Its removal saves the people $13,000,000. The tax on telegraph and telephone messages has been considered a burden on business. It has been removed and saves the people $34,000,000. The tax on motion-picture shows and other admission up to 50 cents has been cut off. This and other reductions in dues and admissions will benefit a lot of people in a small way and saves the people's recreation funds $33,000,000. Tax on trucks costing up to $1,000 has been removed, saving $5,000,000; and the tax on tires, tubes, auto parts, and accessories has been cut in half, saving car owners $20,000,000. These two items should be glad news to auto dealers and users. Tax on theaters and circuses removed, saving $1,600,000; and on carpets and rugs, saving $1,800,000. Tax on eyeglasses and spectacles entirely removed, and on jewelry, clocks, and so forth, reduced by about $11,000,000.

These and other items in this class of taxes come pretty nearly benefiting everybody in the country old enough to eat candy.

Here are the items cut off or in which reductions are made and the amount of taxes saved by the taxpayers:

Telegraph and telephones	$34,000,000
Beverages	10,000,000
Admissions and dues	33,000,000
Trucks and bodies	5,000,000
Tires, tubes, parts, and accessories—cut in half	20,000,000
Candy	13,000,000
Knives, liveries, hunting garments, etc	350,000
Yachts, motor boats—sale	319,000
Carpets, rugs, etc	1,800,000
Jewelry, etc., reduced	11,000,000
Sale of produce on exchange	4,000,000
Theaters, circuses, shows	1,600,000
Brokers in provisions and produce	400,000

An honest effort has been made to cut off those items which have been a nuisance, hard to collect, and were more or less of a burden on a great number of people.

A few new items of tax were added. Estate taxes are increased to produce about $12,000,000. A tax on gifts in excess of $50,000, which will probably net $2,000,000, perhaps more. The tax is increased on playing cards about $700,000. On coin-operated machines about $150,000, and a new tax placed on mah jong sets, which will yield about $1,000,000.

All of which indicate that the people of the country in the next calendar year may keep in their own pockets and spend as they would best enjoy spending about $472,000,000 which last year was required for paying taxes. A very considerable sum indeed—nearly a half billion dollars. And that later this year, 1924, they will receive credits on their tax returns already made out and filed 25 per cent of their income tax—a summer gift from Congress of about $232,750,000.

The new act is a general rewriting of the revenue act of 1921 and subsequent acts. It contains many details not gone into here, some of which will require a lawyer to explain.

The Congress is the economical branch of the Government. The other branches are the spenders. As a rule they are seeking to enlarge and extend their activities, and as a rule are urging increased appropriations. Many of these activities and enterprises for which money is sought may be worthy and probably would be beneficial. Many big demands for big appropriations and increases in appropriations and for big enterprises costing big sums of money come in from the people. These are often backed by great organizations and movements, by lobbies and propaganda. Many of these suggestions may have much merit and probably would be good for the country, but there is a limit to the amount of money the Congress can appropriate if taxes are to be reduced and the national debt paid.

As a member of the most important committee in the House of Representatives, the Committee on Appropriations, during this Congress I have had an opportunity of observing the great and insistent demands for new and greater appropriations all along the line—for greater appropriations and for lower taxes.

A large class of people—a very large class, in fact—seem to assume that if the Government does it, or builds it, or buys it, or pays for it, that it costs nothing. They seem to think that Government money grows on bushes to be gathered at our own sweet will, or is provided by the good Lord after the manner of manna from heaven. But it does not and it is not. Every dollar appropriated for any purpose is reflected somewhere in the taxes.

The Congress is necessarily the economical branch of the Government. The Congress created the Bureau of the Budget, which is working successfully and proves to be a healthy check. The House of Representatives is the economical branch of the Congress. The Appropriations Committee of the House analyzes all appropriation bills, squeezes them down to the safest possible limit, and reports them to the House. The Congress, however, has the final word. It stands between the Treasury and the multitudes who would raid it. It rarely gives as much money as is desired. It stands between the people's desires and their pocketbooks. It is forced sometimes to protect the people against themselves.

It may not be unnatural, then, that the Congress, which will not give the people all the money and all the benefits which they desire and does persist in passing tax bills which never meet with popular approval, does not stand overhigh in the estimation of the people nor get much praise back home.

The last Congress cut the annual taxes about $640,000,000, and this year again about $472,000,000 is lopped off. Gradually the tax burden is being reduced. In fact, the reductions in Federal taxes and appropriations have been rather rapid in the past few years.

Since the Republican Congress was elected in 1918, appropriations and annual expenditures have been reduced very considerably. Appropriations for 1920 were $7,046,000,000, and for 1924 they were only $4,013,000,000.

Here are the yearly appropriations made since the Republican Congress was elected in 1918, which indicates the manner in which expenditures have been cut down from year to year by the Republican Congresses:

Appropriations for fiscal years:
1920	$6,454,596,640
1921	4,780,829,510
1922	4,066,376,366
1923	3,940,579,067
1924	3,706,777,163

While the taxes and expenditures of the cities, counties, and States have been increasing rapidly and substantially, the taxes and expenditures of the National Government have been reduced to just about one-half what they were six years ago.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given to extend my remarks on the conference report on the revenue bill, I desire to say that six months ago tax reduction by the Mellon plan and no adjusted compensation for the ex-service men filled the press. That the two could not stand together was boldly stated. The country was flooded with propaganda in favor of the Mellon plan and against the so-called soldier bonus. The adjusted compensation insurance plan has become a law over the veto of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, who now tells the country he can readily handle it, and now a great revenue bill with tax reduction greater by $22,000,000 than proposed by the Mellon plan has passed both Houses of Congress, and the conference report has been adopted in the Senate by a vote of 60 for to 6 against, and in the House by a vote of 376 for and 9 against, nearly 30 to 1, as against the original Mellon plan, which Mr. Mellon six months ago demanded should be passed by Congress in the shape proposed by him, the central feature of which plan was that the taxes on the very large incomes should be reduced by 50 per cent and on the smaller incomes by only 25 per cent. The bill as it finally passed provides for a reduction of 25 per cent of the larger surtax incomes and 50 per cent for the smaller incomes, a reversal of the proposals in the Mellon plan. The revenue bill as passed will be approved by the President or passed over his veto, and we are now told by the Secretary that he can take care of both the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill and the revenue tax reduction bill and have a large and increasing surplus over and above the other demands of the Government.

What think you now of Mellon—with all his predictions of dire calamity, if his plan failed. A great progressive revenue bill has been approved by an overwhelming vote of Congress, and it shows that of the 6,662,172 income-tax payers of the United States as taken from the latest available returns of 1921 that only 6,109 would be more benefited under the Mellon plan while 6,656,067 would be more benefited under the Democratic plan, adopted with enthusiasm by Congress and will be approved by the country. In the State of Missouri, of the 172,519 making income-tax returns for the same year, 172,413 will be benefited more under this Democratic plan as passed, while only 106 in the State would be more benefited under the Mellon plan—the large income-tax payers.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee assures the House and the country that this bill as approved by the conferees will not create a deficit and that the statement of the Actuary of the Treasury shows that the surplus for the fiscal year 1925, without including the bonus, which will be taken care of out of the previous surplus, will be $138,000,000, and that this bill will reduce taxes on individual and corporate incomes $232,000,000 and excise taxes $56,000,000 this calendar year, a scientific bill worthy of approval by the American people, though utterly misrepresented by propaganda that went out against it. This bill made possible by Democratic and progressive Republican votes is far more worthy than the far-famed Mellon plan, deservedly defeated by the courage of those Representatives who would not yield to the domination and pressure exerted through the influence of the Secretary of the Treasury, and it is to the credit of Congress that it refused to accept the Mellon plan and had the courage to discharge its duty under the Constitution and enact a revenue law far more just and beneficial to all the people. It is conceded that this measure containing many new provisions is an improvement on the existing law.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on a matter of personal privilege. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I desire to correct a report which went out in the press concerning alleged actions of my own here in the House of Representatives on May 20. It is so palpably an error that perhaps it is not necessary, but I do it in justice to myself. I call attention to the article which appeared in the press, and I read from a copy of the San Francisco Examiner. It is as follows:

CONGRESSMEN IN NEAR FIGHT

WASHINGTON, May 20—(By International News Service).—Excitement was occasioned in the House to-day by a near-fistic encounter between Congressmen MACLAFFERTY (Republican), of California, and HOWARD (Democrat), of Nebraska. HOWARD was criticized by MACLAFFERTY for offering objections to procedure. HOWARD replied in a manner to which MACLAFFERTY took exception, and he rushed toward the Nebraskan. The latter rose to meet the charge, but other Congressmen intervened and the angered men were held apart.

HOWARD was formerly secretary to William Jennings Bryan and resembles the commoner physically, and in his dress and general appearance. The remark that irritated MACLAFFERTY was spoken in an undertone and was not understood by Members who sat near him.

When the two Congressmen started to come together there was an immediate rush to their vicinity and cries of "Sit down!"

First, let me say that I am a minister's son, and was taught never to fight except when I was attacked. Mr. HOWARD is a friend of mine and our families are friends. If there was any fighting to be done where Mr. HOWARD was concerned, let me assure you that I would fight only to defend Mr. HOWARD. [Applause.] The facts are these: Gentlemen will remember that a conference report on the naval appropriation bill was being considered. In that conference report was an item of $500,000 for the construction of a very much-needed Marine Corps warehouse at San Francisco. Because my colleague, Mr. KAHN, of California, was away on account of illness, I had been asked if I would kindly look after that item as much as I could. Also I was asked to do so by the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce. My friend, Mr. HOWARD, as a champion of the agricultural interests of this country, was asking for a roll call and insisting then on making the point that there was no quorum present, and I was afraid the delay would jeopardize the naval bill. Several gentlemen were gathered around him trying to persuade him from insisting upon that point, and I came over and joined the merry throng and urged my friend from Nebraska not to insist upon his point of order at that time, and then I turned and walked away. I came no nearer having a fight with my good friend than I am at the present moment. He is my friend, and though I have never asked him whether it is true or not, yet I believe he would say that I am his friend. I rose to correct the mistaken press statement, which does an injustice to both of us. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, responding to the gracious statement of my friend from California [Mr. MACLAFFERTY], I might dismiss it all as I did with the gentleman when I met him the next morning and he told me that he had not dreamed of giving me offense. I told him, taking his extended hand, that I had blotted the incident from my memory, and that I still held him as my friend. In the confusion of the moment he felt that I was jeopardizing legislation in which his own California was peculiarly interested, and I regarded his action as inimical to the promotion of legislation conducive to the welfare of the people of my own Nebraska. I did not at the moment approve the manner of his advocacy of his own legislative program, but I do approve and commend his loyalty to the interests of the people of his Golden State.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute upon the subject of a communication from the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is always a very great pleasure for any Member of this House to find his views on pending legislation coincide with the views of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. I received on May 8 the following letter from the council:

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA (INC.),
May 8, 1924.

To Members of the House of Representatives:

DEAR SIR: We are informed that an agreement has been reached in the suggested legislation on Japanese immigration modifying the original action of the House.

Our committee believes that said modification will alleviate the situation and earnestly hopes it may have your support.

By action just taken by our committee, I am directed to send you this information.

Sincerely yours, JOHN H. FINLEY, Chairman.

To that I replied as follows:

MAY 21, 1924.

Dr. JOHN H. FINLEY,
Chairman Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.

DEAR SIR: I have not before had an opportunity to answer your circular letter of May 8.

I voted for modification of the immigration act which would permit the action desired by the President on the Japanese immigration question, but we were defeated.

Yours very truly,

JOHN PHILIP HILL,
Member of Congress.

[Applause.]

VENEREAL DISEASES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 491, for the prevention of venereal diseases in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Acordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 491, with Mr. SANDERS of Indiana in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill was the special business of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union at the time the District Committee last considered bills on the Union Calendar. A part of the bill has been read, and I take it that the reading will be continued from where it was left off.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the judge of the juvenile court and the judge of any court of criminal jurisdiction, when any person is brought before him for trial or investigation, who believes and has reasonable grounds to believe that any such person is afflicted with syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, shall immediately report said fact to the health officer as herein provided.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. It is so long since we had this bill under consideration that I wish to take this opportunity to inform the House of the general nature of the bill.

The bill follows the general text of laws in more than 40 States in the Union affecting venereal diseases. All during last session there were before our committee several bills on this matter. The committee felt that those bills were too drastic, and a subcommittee, of which I was a member, authorized me to draw a bill along the lines suggested by the committee. As a result of that I prepared this bill. This bill is less drastic on the subject than the laws of the States.

When the war broke out and our boys were inducted into the service, the alarming situation developed that between 27 and 28 per cent of the young men were infected with some venereal disease to a distinguishable extent. The ravages of this disease are not fully appreciated by the public, because of the fact of the secretiveness of the disease and its loathsomeness. I want now to read for you just for a moment a portion of the report of the State Board of Health of Indiana upon this subject.

Syphilis is the greatest destroyer of mankind.

The investigations of the most competent experts show that an alarmingly large per cent of our population is syphilitic, either active or latent.

It is estimated that 8 to 12 per cent of all deaths are caused by syphilis. Most of such deaths are reported as stillbirths, inanition, heart disease, apoplexy, paralysis, locomotor ataxia, insanity, disease of the arteries, kidney diseases, liver diseases, etc.

Syphilis is the one racial poison, reducing the race standard by the breeding of delinquents, moral and physical degenerates. It is probably the greatest causative factor in inefficiency, insanity, pauperism, and crime.

Syphilis causes nearly one-half of all abortions, miscarriages, and stillbirths. Most of the children of syphilitic parents die in very early life.

Gonorrhea is directly responsible for a majority of the appallingly great number of abdominal operations on women, and for a very large percentage of all so-called female troubles. The woman is usually an innocent victim of the husband's earlier indiscretions and his incomplete cure. In men gonorrhea causes sterility, rheumatism, heart disease, bladder trouble, stricture, and other complications.

Syphilis and gonorrhea actually cause more suffering and deaths than smallpox, diphtheria, infantile paralysis, and tuberculosis combined. Death returns usually cloak the true cause.

This bill is an effort to do what can be done along that line. Recently, as a member of a subcommittee investigating the alley situation in the District of Columbia, I visited a lot of places, and in one of these alleys I saw, and I think the other members of the subcommittee will bear me out, a woman who was evidently reeking with venereal disease. Upon inquiry as to what she did for a living, we learned that she was working in a restaurant downtown in the preparation of food. I have not the time nor the information to go into the details of this bill, but I can say that it is indorsed by the military service, by the public health boards, by the civic organizations all over the United States, and the only complaints that have been made against the bill have come from medical authorities in that it is not quite drastic enough. I can say that the bill is not as drastic as the laws of any State on the subject with which I am familiar, and I have read in the preparation of this legislation the laws in some 40 of the States. As Members read the bill it may impress them perhaps as being somewhat drastic in its provisions, but those provisions are necessary by reason of the tendency, and the natural tendency, of any person afflicted with a disease of that kind to conceal the fact.

One may have any other contagious disease and gladly report it to the health authorities, but if he has a disease of this kind, as it carries the odium and suggestion of immorality, it is very natural that he will attempt to conceal it, and a greater invasion into the privacies of the lives of the people is granted in this bill than is generally true in bills affecting other communicable diseases. But, as I have said, this is less drastic than the bills of any other State with which I am familiar.

One more suggestion. I have given this subject a great deal of care and investigation, and I want to say to you I have the decision——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILBERT. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has given quite a good deal of study to this subject, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILBERT. At this point I will only take just a minute or so, but I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee if they care to call upon me when any section of this bill is read I can cite them to the decision either of the Supreme Court of the United States or of some Federal court upholding its constitutionality and validating every section of this bill. There has not been a section that has not been validated by the courts in other States and upheld by the Federal court as well. There is, I am told from sources and conversations I would not like to repeat to the committee, a growing necessity for some legislation of this kind in the District. I did not introduce this bill to begin with. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] introduced a bill on this subject which was referred to the committee and it was in the course of the discussion of his bill, which was excellently drawn, which was a splendid bill and very much more drastic than my bill, and the committee came to the conclusion that bill was more drastic than was necessary. Doctor McCormack, the chief officer of the Board of Health of the State of Kentucky, who had charge of cleaning up of this situation in Panama during the war, and it was rather the exception than the rule among some classes there to be free from this disease, though he complained of my bill at the start as not giving authority enough, after a good deal of study he has come to the conclusion and has written me that he knows of no situation which this bill, if properly administered, will not cover.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want just to take a moment of the time of the committee to corroborate what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] has said. Some three years ago after consultation with Doctor Kober, of the District of Columbia, who is a man of exceptional ability and experience, and Colonel Owens, and others of the District of Columbia, I presented to the Committee of the District of Columbia a bill on this subject which is in general language like that in many of the States, some 44 in number. (H. R. 15822, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session. Introduced on January 20, 1921.) Quite an extensive hearing was had at which the authorities that approved the bill appeared before the committee. This hearing was had on H. R. 4118, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session. Introduced April 18, 1921. Hearings were had on June 9, 1921, on H. R. 4118, which was the same as H. R. 15822 of the Sixty-sixth Congress. A subcommittee was appointed, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] was the chairman of that committee. The subcommittee reported out H. R. 11021, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, Report 864, which is practically the same as the present H. R. 491, Sixty-eighth Congress. At the beginning of the present session of the Sixty-eighth Congress I introduced H. R. 127, on December 5, 1923. The committee reported out the present bill. Relief is what we desired. While the present bill is not so comprehensive as H. R. 127, it is in the right direction. There is some question as to the provisions of the original bill being a little more drastic than this legislation, although upheld by the various courts of the several States in which a similar law had been enacted. The public health officer from Kentucky, who had extended experience not only in his own State, but over the United States, as well as on the Canal Zone, appeared before the committee and the subcommittee. The subcommittee invited me to appear, which I did. The record shows, as has been presented here, the absolute necessity for this kind and character of legislation. At the beginning of this Congress, to expedite the matter the committee took up this bill as one of its first bills and reported out this legislation, and I find there can be no objection to it. The only objection, as the gentleman from Kentucky said, is that some think it is not quite strong enough, but it is in the right direction, and it will bring results. The record shows some 12 per cent of infection as existing by noncontact.

Think of what that means and the others, that at least 60 per cent yield to proper care and proper attention, and by taking charge of these diseases like you take charge of those who have smallpox, scarlet fever, diphtheria, and other contagious diseases. Why, if we just stop to think, a man or a woman infected doing laundry work, waiting on the table, and where infection may occur—and it has occurred—and think of the dreadful, dire effect that it has on the rising generation, for, having once permeated the blood, it is then not capable of being eradicated, and how easy it is to do it now and to prevent this being spread. It seems as though it ought to have been done many, many years ago in the District of Columbia, and I want to join in what has been done and ask that this legislation receive favorable and prompt action by the Congress because of its real necessity and the good it will accomplish, and delay ought not to be permitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. The bill, H. R. 4118, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, upon which extensive hearings were held, and the bill H. R. 127, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, are identical. The last bill referred to is in words and figures as follows:

EXHIBIT A

A bill (H. R. 127) for the prevention of venereal diseases in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That every person in the District of Columbia having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, and who is not at the time under the treatment of a licensed physician in the said District, shall within three days after becoming aware of the existence of the disease report the circumstance to the health officer or his proper representative in the manner prescribed by section 4 of this act.

SEC. 2. That every physician, dentist, nurse, midwife, or other person who professionally attends, calls to visit, examines, prescribes for, or administers or advises treatment to or for any person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall immediately upon becoming aware that such person is so diseased report the circumstances to the health officer in the manner and subject to the conditions set forth in section 4 of this act.

SEC. 3. That every chief administrative officer for the time being of every hospital or dispensary, whether it be or be not devoted to charitable purposes, and of every penal institution, in which, or in attendance upon which, there is a person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall immediately upon becoming aware of that fact report the circumstances to the health officer in the manner and subject to the conditions set forth in section 4 of this act.

SEC. 4. That every report required by this act shall be legibly written in ink, or on a form provided by the health officer for that purpose, shall be signed by the person himself who makes the report, and shall be inclosed in a sealed envelope and sent or delivered sealed to the health officer or his proper representative.

Every report required by sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act shall state the disease from which the diseased person is suffering; his age, sex, color, occupation, and marital state; the date of the onset of the disease as nearly as can be determined; and the probable source of infection; and shall state whether to the knowledge of the person reporting the case it has or has not been previously reported, and, if so, the circumstances of such previous report.

Every report required by sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act shall show name and address of the diseased person unless he be under the professional care of a physician duly authorized to practice medicine in the District of Columbia, or be an inmate of or in attendance upon a hospital or dispensary or a penal institution in said District, in which event a case or record number may be substituted for the name and address, provided the following conditions are complied with: (1) The physician or the chief administrative officer for the time being of said hospital, dispensary, or penal institution, required to report the case, shall keep a systematic and permanent record of every person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid coming under his professional or official notice, and assign to each a case or record number, and (2) such physician or chief administrative officer, as the case may be, shall, in writing, assume responsibility for compliance by the diseased person with all the requirements of this act.

SEC. 5. That if any person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid fail to present himself for examination and treatment at the time appointed for that purpose by the physician who last examined or treated him, or within 10 days after that time; or if, being an inmate of or in attendance upon any hospital, dispensary, or penal institution, he absent himself therefrom and fail to return at the time appointed for that purpose, or within 10 days thereafter; and if, furthermore, he fail to submit to such physician or chief administrative officer, as the case may be, within the period stated, satisfactory evidence to prove that he will present himself or return within a reasonable time, definitely stated, then and in any such event it shall be the duty of such physician or chief administrative officer to report the circumstances immediately over his own signature to the health officer or his proper representative, in writing in ink, under cover, and in every such case the name and last known address of the diseased person shall be stated, except when the diseased person has submitted satisfactory evidence that he is under treatment by some competent physician for syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, in which case the name and address of such physician may be stated in lieu thereof.

SEC. 6. That if any person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, and being under treatment by a physician, or being an inmate of or in attendance upon any hospital, dispensary, or penal institution, fails or refuses to obey or carry out the reasonable instructions given by such physician or by the chief administrative officer for the time being of such hospital, dispensary, or penal institution, to prevent the spread of disease, then and in that event it shall be the duty of such physician or chief administrative officer to report the circumstances to the health officer or to his proper representative in the manner before stated, including the name and last known address of the diseased person; and if the case has been previously reported by number only, and the physician or chief administrative officer has previously assumed responsibility for compliance by the patient with the requirements of this act, then the reporting of such delinquency on the part of the diseased person shall relieve such physician or chief administrative officer from any future liability under the obligations previously assumed by him.

SEC. 7. That any person having symptoms that so resemble the symptoms of syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid as to be indistinguishable therefrom shall, pending diagnosis, adopt such measures against the spread of the disease from which he is apparently suffering as he would be required by this act to adopt were he known to be suffering from that disease: Provided, however, That it shall be the duty of any physician in attendance upon any person aforesaid and of the person himself promptly and effectively to adopt such physical and laboratory measures for diagnosis as may be necessary to determine as expeditiously as is possible the exact nature of the disease.

SEC. 8. That every physician in attendance upon any person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall, when such person becomes no longer capable of infecting others, report that fact to the health officer or his proper representative: Provided, That a person suffering from syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall be deemed no longer capable of infecting others under the following conditions:

In the case of gonorrhea, after a lapse of not less than six weeks from the date of infection and the demonstrated freedom from gonococci of two successive smears taken not less than 48 hours apart, and in the case of males from pus cells in the prostatic secretion.

In the case of syphilis, after the lapse of not less than two years from the date of infection, the healing of all lesions, and at least two successive negative Wassermann tests, not less than three months apart.

In the case of chancroid, after all lesions have completely healed.

All specimens for examination shall be taken and submitted in accordance with methods approved by the health officer, and all examinations shall be made in the laboratory of the health department.

SEC. 9. That every physician who examines or treats a person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, or suspected of having any such disease, shall instruct him as to measures to be adopted to prevent its spread, and as to the necessity for treatment until cured.

SEC. 10. That every person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, or suspecting or believing that he may have any such disease, shall keep himself under competent medical treatment until the nature of the disease from which he is suffering has been determined and, if he has any such disease, until he is known to be incapable of spreading the same.

SEC. 11. That no person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall do anything liable to spread the disease from which he is suffering, or shall refrain from taking any reasonable precautions to limit or prevent the spread of such disease.

SEC. 12. That no person suffering from syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall work as a barber, dentist, masseur, cook, baker, or other producer or handler of food or drink, or in any profession, trade, or occupation in which by reason of the disease from which he is suffering endangers the public health.

SEC. 13. That upon receipt of evidence by the health officer showing to his satisfaction the necessity for isolation of any person suffering from syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid in the interest of public health, the health officer shall designate and define the limits within which the diseased person and his immediate attendant are to be isolated and the precautions to be taken to prevent the spread of the disease during such isolation, and no person other than the attending physician shall enter or leave the area prescribed for such isolation without the permission of the health officer, and then only in accordance with such conditions as the health officer may prescribe. No one but the health officer may terminate such isolation, nor shall such isolation be terminated until the diseased person has become noninfective, as determined by the health officer through physical examinations and all necessary laboratory tests, unless satisfactory evidence has been given the health officer that such isolation may, conditionally or unconditionally, be terminated without danger to the public health.

SEC. 14. That no person not a physician authorized to practice medicine in the District of Columbia shall prescribe or recommend to any other person any drug, medicine, or other substance to be used for the cure or alleviation of syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid.

SEC. 15. That no person shall compound any drug or medicine for the cure or alleviation of syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid from any written formula, order, or prescription not written for the person for whom the drugs or medicines are to be compounded, or from any written formula, order, or prescription not signed by a physician authorized to practice medicine in the District of Columbia.

In the event of the sale of anything for the treatment, alleviation, or cure of syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, and before the delivery of the article sold, the person selling the same shall record in a book kept for that purpose the name of the article, the quantity delivered, the purpose for which it was to be used, the date of delivery, the name and address of the person for whom it is procured, and the name of the individual person selling the same; and said book shall be preserved by the owner thereof for at least three years after the date of the last entry therein; but this requirement shall not apply to articles dispensed upon the written orders of persons believed by the dispenser to be lawfully authorized practitioners of medicine. The record of sale and delivery above mentioned shall not be required of manufacturers and wholesalers who sell any of the substances named at wholesale to licensed pharmacists. The record so made shall be open at any time to inspection of the health officer or his proper representative.

SEC. 16. That the health officer, and other employees in the service of the health department duly authorized by him, are hereby empowered and directed to make such examinations of persons reasonably suspected of having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid as may be necessary to carry out this act, and every person reasonably suspected of having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall submit to such examinations: Provided, That every person convicted of fornication or other unlawful sexual misconduct and every person convicted of any crime or misdemeanor and sentenced to imprisonment in the workhouse or jail shall be examined under the provisions of this act: Provided further, however, That examinations of women shall, in so far as may be practicable, be made exclusively by women physicians.

SEC. 17. That the health officer shall use every available means to ascertain the existence of syphilis, gonorrhea, and chancroid and to discover and eliminate the sources of infection. No person shall hinder or interfere with any officer, employee, or agent of the health department in the discharge of any duty arising out of this act.

SEC. 18. That no person shall make, give, or issue any certificate of freedom from syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, or from venereal diseases generally, or any like certificate, unless he states distinctly on the face thereof the true purpose for which it has been issued, and no such certificate shall be made, given, or issued for the purpose of facilitating the solicitation of sexual intercourse.

SEC. 19. That no person shall give any false name or address, or make any false statement, or submit for examination any unfair or unreasonable specimen for the purpose of evading or nullifying the force of this act.

SEC. 20. That whenever any duty is imposed by this act upon any person and the person upon whom such duty is imposed or would ordinarily fall is a minor child, then the parents or guardian of such minor child shall enforce compliance by him with all the requirements of this act: Provided, That if such minor child has attained the age when he is answerable to the criminal laws for his acts, the responsibility herein imposed upon his parents or guardian shall not relieve such minor child of responsibility on his own account.

SEC. 21. That this act shall not be construed as authorizing or requiring the disclosing of any information concerning the identity or condition of any person diseased by syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, except in so far as may be necessary to carry the act into effect; but no physician or other person shall be civilly or criminally liable for any statement made in good faith under the provisions of this act.

Wherever the word "he" or any other word of masculine gender is used it shall be construed as meaning also the word "she" or the corresponding words of the feminine gender.

SEC. 22. That any person who violates any of the provisions of this act shall on conviction thereof be punished for the first offense by a fine not exceeding $100, and for the second or any subsequent offense by a fine not exceeding $300 or by imprisonment in the workhouse for not exceeding 60 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Showing that H. R. 127, as well as the present bill of Judge GILBERT, is clearly within the right and power of Congress, I present the following:

EXHIBIT B

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, January 28, 1924.

(Memorandum for Congressman WM. E. RAKER)

In accordance with your request to Mr. Willard C. Smith, I am sending you herewith additional papers and citations relating to legislation for the control of venereal diseases.

During the past few years there have been several State supreme court decisions upholding the provisions of venereal-disease-control laws and regulations. The courts have shown a generous disposition to sustain health officers in their efforts to restrain persons infected with venereal disease and to keep such persons in quarantine or under proper treatment until rendered noninfectious. In all these cases, with one exception, the person whose liberty has been denied was actually diseased. The exception is a recent California case entitled "Ex Parte Clements," reported on page 698, volume 215, of Pacific Reporter, in which the court denied an application for a writ of habeas corpus solely on the ground that the petitioner was an inmate of a house of prostitution and that the health officer was therefore justified in holding her as a reasonable venereal-disease suspect and in insisting that she submit to an examination to determine whether in fact she was diseased. No direct evidence was offered to prove that she was infected. The authority under which the health officer exercised this control is rule 5 of the California State Board of Health regulations for the prevention of syphilis and gonococcus infections, which reads:

Local health officers are hereby directed to make examinations of persons reasonably suspected of having syphilis in the infectious stages or gonococcus infection (owing to the prevalence of such diseases among all prostitutes, all such persons may be considered within the above class) to isolate such persons whenever, in the opinion of said local health officer, the State board of health, or its secretary, isolation is necessary to protect the public.

Section 3, chapter 194 of the laws of 1918, State of Mississippi, provides that "any person suspected of being afflicted with any such infectious venereal disease shall be subject to physical examination and inspection by any representative of the State board of health, and for failure or refusal to allow such inspection or examination such person may be punished as for a misdemeanor. This law differs from the California regulation in two respects. (1) Under the California regulations, the health officers are authorized to examine persons reasonably suspected of having a venereal disease. In the Mississippi law nothing is said about the reasonableness of the suspicion. A reasonable exercise of the power might be presumed or implied, of course, although the courts are ever mindful that the proper exercise of all police power which includes all laws for the promotion and preservation of the public health must be reasonable, and if the law leaves any opportunity for arbitrary or unreasonable exercise of power it is violative of the usual constitutional prohibitions against unreasonable searches and seizures as well as repugnant to the underlying principles of the police power of the State. (2) The California regulations authorize the health officer to isolate infected persons whenever it is necessary to protect the public health. The Mississippi law makes the failure to submit to an examination a crime. It it true that courts as well as legislative bodies have not always distinguished clearly between criminal legislation and legislation based on the police power of the State. The power of the health officer to detain anyone rests upon the existence of facts making such detention necessary to protect the public health, hence he is given summary jurisdiction to quarantine and isolate if the circumstances warrant such procedure. Since being infected with a venereal disease is not a crime, a person who is infected or reasonably suspected of being infected ought only be restrained in his liberty by quarantine or isolation which are strictly control measures in the interest of public health. A person may, obviously through willful and deliberate defiance of proper health regulations, make himself liable to criminal prosecution, but whether refusal to submit to a physical examination simply upon suspicion of being infected can be stigmatized as a crime is no doubt open to grave constitutional objections. The service has found one case, In re Walter McGee (185 Pac. 14), in which the following dicta appear:

> "The rules of the State board of health and the city ordinance are assailed as unreasonable. In this instance only those provisions of the rules of the State board of health and of the city ordinance are involved which relate to isolation of persons who have been examined and have been found to be diseased. Reasonableness of provisions relative to discovery and to examination of suspects need not be determined. It may be observed, however, that while provisions of the latter class cut deeply into private personal right the subject is one respecting which a mincing policy is not to be tolerated. It affects the public health so intimately and so insidiously that considerations of delicacy and privacy may not be permitted to thwart measures necessary to avert the public peril. Only those invasions of personal privacy are unlawful which are unreasonable, and reasonableness is always relative to gravity of the occasion. Opportunity for abuse of power is no greater than in other fields of governmental activity, and misconduct in the execution of official authority is not to be presumed."

As stated, there have been a number of decisions by State supreme courts respecting venereal-disease-control law. One dealing particularly with the constitutional phases of the problem was reprinted in Venereal Disease Information, Volume IV, No. 6 (June 20, 1923). The case is that of Ex parte Company, Northeastern Reporter, volume 139, copy of which is inclosed. It contains a rather comprehensive review of the authorities on the subject on personal restraint as a health measure. Other cases involving legislation for the control of venereal diseases are:

> "The State of Washington on the relation of J. S. McBride, plaintiff, v. The Superior Court for King County, respondent (174 Pac. 973); Ex parte Emma Hardcastle (208 S. W. p. 531); Ex parte Grace Brooks (212 S. W. 956); Ex parte Brown (172 N. W. p. 522); Dowling, Health Officer, v. Harden (88 Southern, p. 217); Dowling, Health Officer, v. Glass (88 Southern, p. 218); Application of Travers (192 Pac. 454); Wragg v. Griggin (170 N. W. 400); Ex parte Dillon (186 Pac. 170); Ex parte Johnston (180 Pac. 644); Duncan v. City of Lexington (244 S. W. 60)."

M. J. WHITE,
Assistant Surgeon General.

As has so well been said by Bowers:

EXHIBIT C.

From the time of Fracastorius until the present day the literature of medicine has chronicled the disasters and catastrophes wrought by that master of disease, syphilis. The victims of this plague outnumber, no doubt, those of any other single ailment to which the human flesh is heir. During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries it swept Europe as an almost inextinguishable fire, strewing the Old World with its putrid dead, maiming and disfiguring those who escaped its lethal attacks. By the beginning of the eighteenth century the fury of the epidemic form of syphilis had spent itself; nevertheless its direful assaults upon mankind have continued since that time in subtle and insidious fashions, impairing the functions of the liver and kidneys, affecting the heart and blood vessels with incurable maladies, blinding the eyes, stopping the ears, crippling the limbs, and destroying mind and life itself.

There is no organ or tissue of the body that syphilis does not attack and destroy; there is no disease that has so tremendously affected and altered the course of human destiny as has syphilis. As a killer Osler ranked it third or fourth in the category of disease, and his profound knowledge of medicine in general led him to say, "Know syphilis in all its manifestations and all else clinically will be revealed unto you."

The extent of the prevalence of syphilis can not be accurately stated in figures. We can only make estimates, because the secrecy which surrounds this disorder makes it impossible for us to compile accurate records. Many apparently healthy persons suffer with it unknowingly until some accident or acute illness causes them to seek the aid of a physician, who discovers their luetic infection in the course of his routine examination. Many persons who suffer with this malady refuse or neglect examination. A searching physical examination is always necessary, for the earmarks of syphilis are elusive and likely to be overlooked.

There are a few sources of accurate information. We do know from the reports of Army and Navy examinations, hospital statistics, mortuary tables of life insurance companies, and the findings of careful physicians in private practice that from 10 to 20 per cent of the persons figuring in these statistics suffer from syphilitic infection.

This disease numbers its countless victims among the immoral, the unmoral, the moral, the innocent, the guilty, the infants in the cradle, the aged by the fireside, the rich and the poor, for it is no respecter of persons. At every turn in life we meet its victims. They may serve us our food, make our beds, and take care of our linen in our best hotels; may use the same drinking glasses at public fountains and handle other public utensils. In the industrial world they may drive our locomotives, our street cars, and other public conveyances. They may pass in and out of the sacred portals of our homes. Never are we so serenely safe from possible attack that we can pharisaically and smugly say, "It does not concern us. We are not our brother's keeper."

We are all the guardians of the health and happiness of this great Nation and the enemies of this social plague which wars day and night, without truce or remission, against the progress of humanity.

SOCIOLOGICAL ASPECTS OF LUES

Diseases do not exist alone nor do they affect only the patient who is afflicted with them. Behind every ill to which mankind is heir there lies a sociological background, which has its ramifications in the biological, racial, economic, and political conditions of life. We have been too prone to forget that man is a gregarious creature, and in assuming a too narrow community attitude we have forgotten or ignored the humanistic and social elements of sickness, and in so doing have failed to use all the weapons available against disease.

No disease has so defaced its sociological background with wreck and ruin as has syphilis. Its tentacles reach into all our social institutions, grasping, strangling, and destroying the life of the social unit, the family.

Space permits only the most synoptical discussion of lues in its social relations, and these remarks will be grouped under the following heads: The child, the family, and the State.

The child: Morally every child is entitled to be born of healthy and respectable parents into healthy and respectable surroundings. This should be the normal and natural heritage of every child, but it is regrettable to say that millions have been denied this birthright. Syphilis often denies the child its right to be born, and very often its right to live after it has come into being.

Fournier remarked, apropos of the homicides of lues, "Syphilis is the essential murderer of those young in years; it is the veritable tomb of infants; it is the cause of death before birth, at the moment of birth, after birth, within the first week of birth, or it may await the first year. Syphilis, alcoholism, and tuberculosis constitute the triad of contemporaries."

If the infant escapes with his life at birth, he may endure ills which are worse than death itself, in the form of different manifestations incident to this disease.

In quite a number of instances children born of syphilitic parents appear to be healthy infants, pass through the period of childhood in an uneventful manner, then, at the age of puberty, when their lives are in the bud and full of promise, they develop cerebrospinal syphilis, juvenile tabes, juvenile paresis, and certain types of epilepsy. The symptoms of these forms of inherited syphilis are no different from the manifestations of acquired neuro-syphilis as it is encountered in the adult, except that the symptoms may be slightly more profound. The prognosis in juvenile paresis is hopeless.

While it is impossible to say with mathematical exactness just what relationship lues bears to feeble-mindedness, we can say, and still be very conservative, that at least 5 per cent of all congenital mental defectiveness is due to syphilis.

Probably none of the tragedies of this monster of evil is more woeful or hideous than the one it visits upon the unoffending, innocent, and helpless second generation.

The family: No disease is so disastrous to the welfare of the family unit as syphilis. In many instances its presence forever precludes the possibility of marriage, for there are earnest, conscientious persons who, having acquired this infection, feel themselves forever barred from matrimony, no matter how vigorously they may have pursued treatment and no matter how apparently free they are from infection. Like Damocles, they feel that the sword is ever suspended above their heads by the hair of uncertainty. Others who do not feel so keenly about the luetic catastrophe, yet are mindful of the disasters that active luetic infection may bring to their mates and offspring, postpone marriage for long periods of time.

If the syphilitic individual enters matrimony in the contagious state, or if a person acquires this infection after marriage, a very serious train of events is likely to follow. The innocent mate is most certain to be infected; if pregnancies take place, abortions, miscarriages, and stillbirths will follow in a very large number of instances. If children are born after the virus has become somewhat attenuated and the parents have developed a condition of relative immunity, the future may be dark for the children and full of the terrors with which we are all familiar.

Occasionally nature, in her warfare against syphilis, fortunately brings about a condition of sterility. Various obstetricians have estimated that from 45 to 75 per cent of sterility is caused by syphilis.

The syphilitic is quite likely to spread his infection to others during the contagious state through the use of household articles and utensils. Records of these sad occurrences are all too frequent. Many a wayward son has, through his carelessness, unwittingly infected his mother, brother, or sister. Medical literature is replete with examples of this sort.

The knowledge that one of the marital partners has acquired lues changes the atmosphere of the home. If the disease is acquired after marriage, divorce is a common result; or, if the individual had this infection before marriage and in spite of the knowledge that he had it, and in an infectious state, entered into matrimony, divorce usually follows when the deceived mate learns the real state of affairs. Very recently, in one of our courts, the innocent mate was given financial damages because of her infection, and the guilty partner was given a penal sentence. It is suggested that it would be a wise procedure for all our courts to recognize that it is decidedly criminal for one individual deliberately or knowingly to subject another to infection with venereal disease. To the writer's personal knowledge in four different instances murder was committed because unfaithful wives infected their husbands. However, we know from statistics that it is usually the wife who is the innocent sufferer.

Phobias are nearly always present in the minds of intelligent parents who have been infected with lues. They fear that every ill their children may have may be due to this dread disease, and the torment of these fears is often terrific.

Many homes are broken up by death, or the wage earner of the family becomes a chronic invalid, using for treatment the earnings or savings which should have been spent in caring for his family. In the early stages of the disease the earning power of the luetic may be temporarily reduced during the period of active treatment, and later on in life, if curative treatment has not been secured, be permanently reduced or cut off entirely by the existence of diseases which may be dependent on lues. Those families who are not blessed with an abundance of financial means soon have their purses depleted and are thrown upon public or private charity. The financial operations of the paretic, rich or poor, have in many instances reduced his family to bankruptcy, just as his antisocial and criminal behavior has frequently brought it into disgrace.

In the last analysis, to the members of the family syphilis means illness, mental or physical incapacity, sorrow, and financial and social ruin unless medical and social relief is promptly and efficiently rendered to prevent such a catastrophe.

The State: Whatever agencies make havoc on the child or the family are destructive to the welfare of the State. Whenever the children of the State are blinded, crippled, paralyzed, and reduced to imbecility and incapacity, the State is robbed of citizens who should have been self-supporting and useful and in addition is compelled to build and maintain institutions for human derelicts. Every institution for the feeble-minded, the blind, the deaf and dumb, the insane, and the epileptic, is a monument, in some degree, to our carelessness and wastefulness of human life, to our indifference and to our ignorance of the vast ramifications of the great venereal-disease problem.

In the past we have paid too little attention to the extragenital infection of lues. We have exhibited a pharisaical inqiffernce, being inclined to look upon lues as a punishment for sexual immorality. This attitude is neither scientific nor moral. It can be said without fear of contradiction and with the full support of those who are informed, that 10 per cent of all syphilitics acquire this disease in an innocent manner. In many instances the innocent sufferer from the infection is unaware of his condition until he is suddenly stricken down with an illness of a serious character. These same innocent sufferers from lues unknowingly, but none the less disastrously, spread their infection to the public.

The histories of luetic persons coming into our clinics show that at least 35 per cent of them are engaged in occupations which bring them in immediate contact with the public. It is frightful and appalling to know that a very large group of them are handlers of our food, laundry workers, barbers, servants in our homes, masseurs, tailors, and others who render very personal services. Fortunately for us all, the contagious period passes fairly promptly in many of them because of treatment and the evolution of the disease.

When the public and the captains of industry open their eyes more widely to the enormous cost of syphilis in money there will be a sweeping endeavor to remove luetics from industry and from social activities that endanger the public interest. The histories in our hospitals for the insane show that an alarming percentage of paretics have been chauffeurs, motormen, conductors, engineers, firemen, and policemen, and have filled other positions in which they were responsible for the safety of the public. This clearly indicates that our lax methods of medical examination and license must give way to systematic and searching methods of physical examination and diagnosis.

The loss to industry is enormous in a number of ways. When an ataxic luetic receives an injury because of his clumsiness in the performance of his work, he very often is placed upon the pension rolls of the company for an indefinite period through the operation of our compensation laws, because of the prolonged convalescence which these individuals usually undergo, and the company pays out considerable money for which there is no return. As we all know, the most trivial injuries may incapacitate the luetic for long periods of time. We can easily surmise the losses such individuals cause to industry.

Cost of late syphilis to the State: According to the United States census of the year 1910, there were at the beginning of the year 1916, 147 State hospitals for the insane, caring for 199,340 persons at a total cost of $36,312,662. These figures are not now correct, for since that time many new State hospitals have been built and are filled to overflowing and the States are endeavoring to build more.

Conservative psychiatrists of the country have frequently estimated that no less than 25 per cent of all the admissions to our State institutions are due to syphilis. At that rate the cost of syphilis alone for State hospital care in 1916 was nearly $10,000,000. This same census states that there were 423 other State institutions in existence for the same period of time. We can be quite certain that lues contributed very largely to their population also, and we can conservatively estimate that the total cost of luetics for institutional care during 1916 was at least $15,000,000 more. In these figures the cost of private and public charity and the loss to industry were not considered.

Williams in his study of 100 cases of syphilis in the State hospitals of Massachusetts, basing his estimate on the weekly cost of only $6 (which is far too low) estimated that these same luetics cost the State of Massachusetts $39,312 for a period covering a little more than a year. Doctor Pollock estimated that the syphilitics in the State hospitals of the State of New York cost that Commonwealth $417,918 in the year 1917. The cost of the care of syphilitics in State hospitals in the State of Indiana for the year 1919, according to the secretary of the State board of health, was nearly $1,000,000. The State Board of Health of California has reported that insane syphilitics cost that State $160,000 for the years 1918 and 1919.

These figures convey but very faintly the enormous economic cost of syphilis. When we stop to think that all the States of the Union are paying sums in proportion for the cost of syphilis, the aggregate transcends the limits of the imagination. We probably spend more money each year on the direct and indirect effects of syphilis than we do for the maintenance of our Army and Navy in times of peace. The time has long since arrived when we should have acted upon the maximum of Benjamin Franklin that "Public health is public wealth." All students of the sociological aspect of syphilis perforce agree with Herbert Spencer when he says, "To be a good animal is the first requisite to success in life, and to be a nation of good animals is the first condition to national prosperity."

Dealing with venereal-disease problem: The time-honored adage that "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" has no more fitting application than to the great public-health problem of syphilis. The inertia of the public must be overcome and unreasoning prejudice must be supplanted by accurate information. The moralistic misconception of the venereal-disease problem is responsible for a tremendous amount of social damage. The idea that every syphilitic is a roué and a social outcast is as fallacious as it is unkind. These erroneous ideas prevent the proper appreciation of the fact that no less than 10 per cent of all luetics suffer from congenital and innocent types, that thousands of innocent women suffer from lues, and that thousands are syphilitic because of the laws of heredity and congenital transmission. The belief that it is a visitation for sexual immorality has retarded the control and prevented in a very large measure the eradication of the venereal plague. We must place syphilis on the same level as we do other diseases and fight it in a safe, sane, and scientific manner, free from metaphysical conceptions and dicta.

The public must be so educated in the matter of eugenics that the laws with regard to venereal disease which now exist as dead letters on our statute books will be enforced; that health certificates will really be required before marriage; that the physician will be permitted to give to the marriage-license clerk information that will prevent the marriage of a contagious luetic without being haled into court on the ground that he has given away confidential information; that marriages may be annulled when a luetic deliberately enters matrimony, deceiving his mate as to the presence of his venereal disorder.

Sex hygiene should be taught the child, the youth, and the adult. The dangers of venereal disease must be brought again and again to the attention of the public until it is so aroused concerning the matter that it will take the necessary steps to correct the evils resulting from prostitution.

There is a group of persons within the social organism which is governed in its sexual life by idealism and not by fear. Therefore a positive idealism must always be taught concerning sex life. There is another group whose conduct is entirely regulated by fear, and to this group must be preached in forceful terms the dangers of illicit sexual relations. There is a third group that is not controlled either by fear or sexual idealism and responds to the sexual urge, irrespective of the possible consequences to themselves or to others. It is therefore imperative that physicians, health departments, and communities use all agencies in their power for the relief and prevention of venereal diseases.

Our social institutions are by no means perfect. Society continually places temptations in the way of the morally and mentally weak. We are responsible at least to some degree for the existence of environments which stimulate vice and furnish the facilities for its successful progress, and it is obvious that these conditions very effectually reduce the effects of our moral preachments.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the chief health officer is authorized and directed to order to quarantine any person who is found under the provisions of this act to have syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, and to adopt for the protection of public health such precautionary measures as are found necessary to prevent the spread of any other highly contagious or infectious disease.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Page 3, lines 19 and 20, after the word "authorized," strike out "and directed." I ask the gentleman if he will accept that amendment?

Mr. GILBERT. I think when we authorize, that is all that is needed; and, although the language follows the laws in the States, I will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. UNDERHILL: Page 3, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "and directed."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That any physician who professionally attends any person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall, in addition to treating such person for his improvement and cure, advise said person as to the proper means to prevent the spread of said disease, and shall so order him isolated as to prevent any spread therefrom, and it shall be the duty of said physician, upon the willful failure or refusal of such patient to comply with the directions of said physician to prevent the spread of said disease, to report said person to the health officer as herein prescribed by this act.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 5, line 9, after the word "and," insert "if necessary."

I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] whether he will accept that amendment?

Mr. GILBERT. Along the same line that was suggested as to the amendment to the other section, not giving them a positive direction but when it is necessary giving them authority, I can not see any objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: Page 5, line 9, after the word "and," insert the words "if necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 491) for the prevention of venereal diseases in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as agreed to do pass.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. ZIHLMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PARK AND PLAYGROUND SYSTEM OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 112, a bill providing for a comprehensive development of the park and playground system of the National Capital. Pending that motion, I would like to submit the unanimous-consent request that general debate be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 112.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 112, with Mr. CRAMTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the bill is very short, and the 25 or 30 interested Members who have stayed here to transact District business would be enlightened by hearing it read. I think it ought to be read and I insist on its being read.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to preserve the flow of water in Rock Creek, to prevent pollution of Rock Creek and the Potomac and Anacostia Rivers, to preserve forests and natural scenery in and about Washington, and to provide for the comprehensive, systematic, and continuous development of the park, parkway, and playground system of the National Capital, there is hereby constituted a commission, to be known as the National Capital Park Commission, composed of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, the Director of the National Park Service, and the Chief of the Forest Service, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds and the chairmen of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and House of Representatives. At the close of each Congress the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall appoint, respectively, a Senator elect and a Representative elect to the succeeding Congress to serve as members of this commission until the chairmen of committees of the succeeding Congress shall be chosen. The officer in charge of public buildings and grounds shall be the executive and disbursing officer of said commission.

SEC. 2. Said commission or a majority thereof is hereby authorized and directed to acquire such lands as in its judgment shall be necessary and desirable in the District of Columbia and adjacent areas in Maryland and Virginia, within the limits of the appropriations made for such purposes, for suitable development of the National Capital park, parkway, and playground system. That said commission is hereby authorized to acquire such lands by purchase when they can be acquired at prices reasonable in the judgment of said commission, otherwise by condemnation proceedings, such proceedings to acquire lands within the District of Columbia to be in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, providing a site for the Government Printing Office (U. S. Stat. L. vol. 26, chap. 837), the Chief of Engineers of the Army being, for the purposes of this act, hereby clothed with all the power vested by the said act of August 30, 1890, in the board created by that act. Said commission is hereby authorized to acquire such lands, located in Maryland or Virginia, either by purchase or condemnation proceedings, by such arrangements as to acquisition and payment for the lands as it shall determine upon by agreement with the proper officials of the States of Maryland and Virginia. In the selection of lands to be acquired the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts shall be requested. The designation of all lands to be acquired by condemnation, all contracts for purchase of lands, and all agreements between said commission and the officials of the States of Maryland and Virginia shall be subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

SEC. 3. That there is authorized to be appropriated, each year hereafter, in the annual District of Columbia appropriation act, a sum not exceeding 1 cent for each inhabitant of the continental United States as determined by the last preceding decennial census, to be available until used, said sum to be used by said commission for the acquisition of the lands herein authorized to be acquired by said commission for the purposes named, the compensation for the land, the expense of surveys, ascertainment of title, condemnation proceedings, if any, and necessary conveyancing to be paid from said appropriations. That three-fourths of all the funds so appropriated shall be used by said commission for the acquisition of lands within the District of Columbia and the funds so used to acquire property within the District shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and the general funds of the Treasury in the same proportion as other expenses of the District of Columbia. The land so acquired within the District of Columbia shall be a part of the park system of the District of Columbia and be under control of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army; that areas suitable for playground purposes may, in the discretion of said commission, be assigned to the control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for playground purposes. That the land so acquired outside the District of Columbia shall be controlled as determined by agreement between said commission and the proper officers of the States of Maryland and Virginia, such agreements to be subject to the approval of the President.

SEC. 4. That said commission shall report to Congress annually on the first Monday of December the lands acquired during the preceding fiscal year, the method of acquisition, and the cost of each tract. It shall also submit to the Bureau of the Budget on or before September 15 of each year its estimate of the total sum to be appropriated for expenditure under the provisions of this act during the succeeding fiscal year.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, had further insisted on its amendments, had asked further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. HARRIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE PARK AND PLAYGROUND SYSTEM OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I will explain this bill very briefly. Its object is to provide for a comprehensive development of the park and playground system of the National Capital.

It constitutes a commission, to be known as the national park commission, composed of the Chief Engineer of the Army, the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, the Director of the National Park Service, the Chief of the Forest Service, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, the chairman of the House District Committee, and the chairman of the Senate District Committee. It provides further in that connection for the designation of some newly elected Member of the House or the Senate, who will be in the next Congress, to act on this park commission when Congress is not in session.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. As I understand from the report of the committee, this bill is based on the orderly development of the city and its parks as a continuation and extension of the L'Enfant plan.

Mr. GIBSON. The L'Enfant plan, of course, was only for 100 years and we have outgrown that plan; in fact, we outgrew it a great many years ago. But it may well be called a continuation of that plan.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. It is a sort of necessary extension of the spirit of that excellent plan?

Mr. GIBSON. That is the idea.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I want to say to the gentleman that to me it seems a very excellent plan and I am entirely for it.

Mr. GIBSON. I will say to the gentleman in that connection that it also includes a development in Virginia, territory contiguous to the District of Columbia, and in your own State of Maryland.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GIBSON. At the outset let me say that this does not create a commission with salaries. All of the members of the commission are officers of the Government and draw salaries.

The bill provides that this commission is authorized and directed to acquire lands, as to its judgment may seem necessary, in the District of Columbia, in Maryland, and in Virginia for the suitable development and extension of the park system and playgrounds. These lands are to be acquired by purchase, if possible, and if not possible, by condemnation. The lands in Virginia and Maryland are to be acquired under some proceedings agreed upon between this commission and the regularly constituted officers of the State of Maryland and of the State of Virginia. It authorizes an appropriation to be made not to exceed 1 cent for every inhabitant of the United States. This would give something over $1,000,000 a year for the orderly and proper development of the park system of the District of Columbia.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] has referred to the L'Enfant plan, which was the original plan, Major l'Enfant being a distinguished engineer officer of the French Army who was engaged by Washington and Jefferson and acted under their direction in laying out the plan of the city of Washington. This plan provided for some parks, but those parks are the little triangular spaces, the circular spaces, or the square spaces that you find at the intersection of our avenues and streets. This plan was made in 1791. Since that time we have acquired some land for park purposes in the District, but not an acre was acquired outside of Florida Avenue from the time this plan was conceived up to 1890. Since then we have acquired 2,058 acres at a cost of $3,589,998.

In extent and value of the park system the city of Washington is at the foot of the list of cities of the United States with a population of 300,000 or more. For instance, in comparison with Chicago, that city has a wonderfully extensive system of city parks and connecting boulevards and has acquired a forest reserve of 24,000 acres outside of the city and is now proceeding to acquire 10,000 acres more. At one time the city had a bond issue of $30,000,000 for park extension purposes. San Francisco had expended, before 1912, $7,500,000 on one park alone, Golden Gate Park, and it has 33 other parks. Boston has expended over $21,000,000 in the extension of its park system between 1892 and 1920; during that time Washington expended a little over $3,000,000.

Statistics showing the value of park property in the various cities having over 300,000 people for 1916 and 1919 are as follows:

New York, value of park property in 1916, $649,000,000; 1919,. $687,000,000.

Chicago, in 1916, $59,695,000; in 1919, $60,462,000.

Philadelphia, in 1916, $30,000,000; and in 1919, $43,000,000.

St. Louis, $13,000,000 in 1916; and in 1919, $15,000,000.

Boston, in 1916, $69,209,000; and in 1919, $69,300,000.

Cleveland, in 1916, $28,000,000; and in 1919, $29,000,000.

Los Angeles, in 1916, $10,000,000; and in 1919, $11,000,000.

And so on through the list down to the city of Washington, which shows a park property value of $4,745,660 in 1916; and in 1919, $5,168,477.

I have just given the round figures and will insert in the RECORD, if there is no objection, the complete table giving the figures in detail.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is it the plan to buy these old Civil War forts on the ridges surrounding the city here?

Mr. GIBSON. As I understand it, that is included in the plan.

Mr. TILSON. If that is not done pretty soon, they will be built over, will they not?

Mr. GIBSON. That is very true, and one object of this bill is to take care of just such situations by a regularly constituted commission with power to act, so that when the opportunity presents itself to acquire good park property it may be acquired. We have had many experiences in the city of Washington where valuable property for park purposes was commenced to be built over and it was necessary in order to get action to come to Congress, to go to the Budget to get a recommend of appropriation, and in the meantime they have been built over and thereby have been lost.

Mr. TILSON. Will this bill give power to the commission to take options and tie up property so that they may secure it after an appropriation has been made?

Mr. GIBSON. That is my understanding of the scope of the authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. GIBSON. Recurring to the point as to value of park property, let us bear in mind that the average value of the park property of all of the cities of over 300,000 population, outside the city of New York, is $22,000,000, while that of the city of Washington is only a little over $5,000,000.

I will say in further answer to the gentleman from Connecticut that there is an unfinished plan of park development for the city of Washington. In 1901 we had a park commission that consisted of many men eminent in their lines of work, including Augustus St. Gaudens, a very distinguished artist. They made a very careful study of this situation, taking the L'Enfant plan as the basis, and worked out a comprehensive scheme of development for the future, and that report now stands as a working plan ready for use. This plan includes the acquiring of the forest-covered valleys and springs tributary to Rock Creek, the widening of Piney Branch parkway to the northeast from Tiger Bridge, the acquirement of Klingle Ford Valley, the Patterson tract, and tracts of land on the outskirts at proper intervals for parks and playgrounds. It also included the development of the valley of Rock Creek northward from the District line on both banks of the Potomac to Great Falls and the development of park boulevards down the Potomac to Mount Vernon on the Virginia side and to Fort Washington on the Maryland side.

This plan also calls for cooperation with the city of Baltimore, in boulevard development, the acquiring of the Civil War forts which the gentleman from Connecticut has referred to. It also includes the boulevard development from the Virginia terminal of the Memorial Bridge and other places. This work can all be taken care of without coming to Congress and troubling Congress for every little park area needed, if we constitute this commission. At the present time there is no department, no bureau, no commission, or official, either of Federal or of the District government, authorized to study the situation and work out any systematic plan. There is no existing law for park development of land or any Budget estimate; no official authority invited to select and submit estimates for additional parks. The present method is a failure. We must pass a bill after weeks of work in a committee and weeks of delay, and subsequently get an appropriation. When available park areas are needed there is not time to get the necessary appropriation in time to stop the devastation, and the result is that we have lost many valuable parks on that account.

This is indorsed by the Commissioners of the District, and, Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a letter from the District Commissioners to the chairman of the Senate committee, Senator BALL.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the District Commissioners. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the letter referred to:

FEBRUARY 23, 1924.

Hon. L. HEISLER BALL,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
United States Senate.

SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit the following on Senate 112, Sixth-eighth Congress, first session, entitled "A bill providing for a comprehensive development of the park and playground system of the National Capital," which you referred to them for report as to the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

The object of the bill is to provide for a comprehensive park and playground system in the District of Columbia and its environs, which include adjacent parts of Maryland and Virginia. The commissioners are heartily in favor of the purpose of the bill, as it is believed that the need for the acquisition of additional park and playground areas is urgent. Such areas must and will be provided eventually, and it is in the interests of economy to make the necessary purchases while the land is unimproved. Moreover, some of the areas desired will be lost forever unless obtained soon.

The commissioners submitted a copy of this bill to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget in accordance with the provisions of Circular No. 49 of that bureau.

On February 5, 1924, a meeting was held in the office of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, at which there were present representatives of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, of the committee of 100 appointed to develop a comprehensive system of National Capital parkways, of the Washington Board of Trade, of the Washington Chamber of Commerce, of the Federation of Citizens' Associations, and other various citizens' associations. At that meeting the Director of the Bureau of the Budget suggested that it was the general tendency to decrease rather than to increase the number of commissions, and he requested consideration of the question whether, in view of the fact that the so-called Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission was in existence under the statute of 1913, it would not be practical, if the other terms of Senate bill 112 were satisfactory, to enlarge the existing Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission and give to it the powers and duties included in the proposed legislation. After extended discussion it was unanimously agreed that it might be desirable to amend the pending bill by striking out section 1 thereof and by substituting a section along the lines of the proposed section 1 given below. This substitute section proposes to enlarge the existing commission so as to include the chairmen of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives and the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia. It proposes to give to the commission as created the name of the National Capital Park Commission, vest in it all the powers, obligations, and functions now held by the so-called Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission, and all powers, obligations, and functions included in Senate bill No. 112. The executive officer of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission was unable to be present at the conference on February 5, but the proposed amendment has been submitted to him and has received his approval.

The substitute for section 1 of the bill reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That to preserve the flow of water in Rock Creek, to prevent the pollution of Rock Creek and the Potomac and Anacostia Rivers, to preserve forests and natural scenery in and about Washington, and to provide for the comprehensive and continuous development of the park, parkway, and playground system of the National Capital, the commission created by section 22 of the public buildings act approved March 4, 1913 (Stat. L. vol. 37, p. 885), commonly called the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission, shall hereafter be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, and the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia. At the close of each Congress the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall appoint, respectively, a Senator elect and a Representative elect to the succeeding Congress to serve as members of this commission until the chairman of the committees of the succeeding Congress shall be chosen. The officer in charge of Public Buildings and Grounds shall be the executive and disbursing officer of said commission. From and after the passage of this act the said commission shall be known as the National Capital Park Commission, hereinafter referred to as the "commission," and it is hereby vested with and shall assume and exercise all the powers, obligations, and functions conferred upon said Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission by said act approved March 4, 1913, and all subsequent acts and court proceedings."

The commissioners are informed by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that the bill as so amended is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Very respectfully,

THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
By CUNO H. RUDOLPH, President.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Are they the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a few hours ago we had 385 Members of Congress present.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. We can have 385 Members here again in a few minutes, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, do not do that; we want to occupy this time.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. If the gentleman will take out of the RECORD the statement that we had 385 Members present and only 25 now, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a part of my argument and I must leave it in the RECORD.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. I do not think it is a very good argument and I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRAMTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 112, providing for a comprehensive development of the park and playground system of the National Capital; and finding itself without a quorum he had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 305 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he handed in a list of absentees for printing in the Journal.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, when the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPROUL] made the point of order, I had just called attention to the fact that a half hour previous we had 385 Members on the floor to vote on the tax reduction bill, while at that particular time we had only 25 Members left on the floor to pass on this bill involving an annual appropriation of $1,100,000; and that is illustrative of the condition that still prevails here in the District of Columbia with regard to tax matters, to the detriment of the people of the United States who pay much of the bill. That is the reason why there has been no change in the existing law in that respect.

We thus have one of the strangest situations imaginable here in the District of Columbia. This is a city, according to the last census, of 437,000 people, exclusive of transients and exclusive of Members of the House and Senators and their employees, who maintain their residences in their home States. At one time this was a very small city. It was nothing more than a big town, and the people who then owned the real property remember that its value was a very low figure, indeed; but the Government of the United States has expended millions of dollars here in the construction of magnificent buildings, and securing and maintaining magnificent grounds in this Capital, and besides its own property has given $215,000,000 to Washington for civic purposes. Property values have soared upward until now in many instances you find lots that at one time were worth no more than a hundred dollars now are worth, with their improvements, a million dollars.

For instance, our colleague from New York [Mr. BLOOM], who is present on the floor at this time, according to the paper yesterday, indicated that he is willing to give this Government the stupendous sum of $5,000,000 for the block of land upon which stands the Patent Office.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Ten million dollars.

Mr. BLOOM. Eight million dollars. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. I said that the property was worth $10,000,000, but that I was willing to give $8,000,000 for it.

Mr. BLANTON. And the distiguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] is an expert on property values in the country because he is an extensive real-estate owner in the metropolitan city of New York. I mention this to show you what property values are now, and the Government's expenditures and pay roll have caused it, for, as I said, in addition to the great sums of money that this Government has expended upon its own buildings and grounds here in this great city, gentlemen should remember that this Government, out of the Public Treasury, has already given the city of Washington for civic purposes wholly the great sum of $215,000,000, which has also been expended here. And what is the tax rate in this great city? One dollar and twenty cents on the hundred dollars, and at a very low valuation, assessed at not much over 50 per cent valuation in most cases, and we are continuing that in a ridiculous fiscal policy that yet requires the taxpayers of the United States to pay 40 per cent of all of the local civic expenditures here in the city of Washington. Until 1922 these same taxpayers paid every year 50 per cent of these expenses of this great city. Why is it that that is permitted? It must be because the membership of this House have not yet all found it out. It is because the membership of this Congress have not all given close investigation to the subject.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The Members of the House seem to be pretty well aware of it and a short time ago adopted a proposition for a lump-sum appropriation of $8,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman should convince the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to call attention to that. Just about as many men as are present now were present when we adopted that $8,000,000 fixed-contribution amendment. The distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], who now occupies the chair, presiding over this body, was the author of that amendment, which changes the present policy of 60–40 that is now the fiscal relation to a fixed contribution toward local civic expenses to be made by the Government of $8,000,000 a year, and what do we find concerning that proposed change in the vigilant Washington newspapers?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I read from the Washington Post——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is that a daily paper?

Mr. BLANTON. It is the mouthpiece of the administration, published for us every morning. I read from the Washington Post of yesterday—Sunday—and it says in the following big headlines:

Three million four hundred and forty-nine thousand three hundred and twenty-two dollars is added to the District bill by Senate committee—$28,102,019 is total carried in measure.

And this article then recites:

Carrying appropriations amounting to $28,102,019, which is $3,449,322 more than provided by the House, the District appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1925 was favorably reported to the Senate yesterday by the Committee on Appropriations.

A further increase in the appropriation may be made when the bill is considered on the floor of the Senate this week, as Senator LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS, of Colorado, in charge of the measure, has been authorized by the committee to offer amendments which would add $1,062,000 to the bill.

If the Phipps amendments authorizing appropriations of $762,000 for enlarging the park system and $300,000 toward the construction of a $735,000 fireproof addition to the courthouse are adopted the bill will go to conference carrying appropriations amounting to $29,164,019, the largest amount ever authorized in a District supply bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I want to get before you these facts connectedly. Now listen while I read the balance of this article from yesterday's Washington Post:

Senator PHIPPS is expected also to offer as an amendment to the bill, his bill, recently passed by the Senate, making the District surplus fund, amounting to $4,438,154, available for expenditures. With the adoption of this amendment the bill would carry $33,602,173, which is more than the commissioners and the people of Washington ever expected in the wildest flights of fancy.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield gladly.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Then if the Congress shall adopt this $8,000,000 proposition, it would not matter a snap of the finger how much the Senate or the House put on this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Why, of course not, so far as the taxpayers of the United States are concerned.

Mr. UNDERHILL. As far as the other taxpayers of the country are concerned.

Mr. BLANTON. Except, of course, as to the $8,000,000, which is more than they should pay. I will tell my friend what it will amount to, so far as the people of Washington are concerned—a mere bagatelle so far as taxes will be increased, but it will stop to some little extent this everlasting growing drain on the Treasury for the city of Washington. It is absurd to think of even $8,000,000 a year for this Government to contribute in taxes to this city when the Government's property is daily enjoyed by all the people, and it owns the main water conduit here. It owns it, and it paid every dollar for it, and the people of Washington have never yet paid one red cent on that main water conduit, and every piece of Government property in this city is daily enjoyed by all the people of Washington.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to speak for 30 minutes without yielding, and then I will yield. I want to put these facts before my colleagues and before the country. I do not want to tire my colleagues, and if you would prefer to go to the baseball, why go; but I want to get these facts in the RECORD.

Mr. O'CONNELL of New York. The gentleman will not have a roll call in their absence?

Mr. BLANTON. I hope there will be no more roll calls until the final passage of the bill. I was not responsible for the last one.

Mr. O'CONNELL of New York. I know that.

Mr. BLANTON. Washington people now pay only $1.20 on the $100 taxes. This $8,000,000 proposition passed by the House is a fixed contribution to be paid annually by the Government, and it would require the people of Washington to pay not more than $1.30 or $1.35 on the $100 at the most, while the people of Baltimore, right over here 40 miles away from this Capitol, are now paying a tax rate of $3.27 a hundred.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That includes State taxes.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but that $3.27 per $100 is the tax rate people in Baltimore pay. The little $1.20 per $100 here in Washington includes every tax that the people of Washington pay. It is their total taxes. Now, all the people of Washington are not interested in or connected with this Government. We have 65,000 employees here, a great percentage of whom are young ladies unmarried.

Mr. O'CONNELL of New York. How does the gentleman know it?

Mr. BLANTON. I have investigated and found out. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'CONNELL of New York. That is a misfortune.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you know that there are many people living here in this District who were born here, whose fathers and grandfathers were born here in this city, and neither they nor any of their family connections have had any connection whatever with this Government, none in the world except to get the benefits of this low tax rate in this beautiful city in which they live? Is not that a wonderful situation? The people in my State, from one side of it to the other, counting their total taxes, pay all the way from $2.75 to $4 or more on the $100 in taxes. Write back home and ask your people what they pay. They will tell you they do not enjoy this ridiculous low rate of only $1.20 on the $100 enjoyed by Washingtonians, and yet not long ago when the commissioners attempted to relieve themselves and the people of Washington of a property tax on automobiles we stopped their little game and passed that bill with the property tax in it, and forced it through Congress just like the House wanted it, with the property tax left intact, and these various citizens' organizations went down to the commissioners and before the conferees and tried their dead-level best to get the property tax stricken out; and when they could not do it, they then tried to get the President to veto the bill. Why? To escape taxes on automobiles. And now they have had meeting after meeting against this Cramton amendment, and have influenced the Senate committee to wipe out this proposed Cramton plan, which is just one small step in the right direction on this tax subject, and the Senate committee has put back that 60–40 plan in the bill; and your people at home and mine, if we allow it, will continue to pay 40 per cent of all the local civic expenses of these 437,000 people of this District of Columbia. It is not right. It is not just.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MOREHEAD. The gentleman seems to be thoroughly posted. May I ask how many, if any, of the Members of the House or the Senate own real estate in Washington?

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell the gentleman quite a number of them.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I do not ask for their names.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not going to call names, because I like my colleagues too well.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I thought that might have something to do with the liberal appropriations for the District.

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell you some pertinent facts along that line in a moment. Do you know what this bill now before us proposes to do? Did our friend from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], our able and distinguished colleague, tell you altogether what this was going to cost you and your people? No. I will tell you what it is going to cost you. By this bill you are authorizing—and an authorization is a direction to the Appropriations Committee—the Appropriations Committee every year in the District supply bill to bring in a fixed annual appropriation of $1,100,000 for parks and playgrounds. Our friend from Vermont did not tell you that this $1,100,000 is to be given them every year from now to eternity, and yet you ought to know that when you vote for this bill.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. Does not the gentleman remember that I stated it called for an appropriation of a little more than $1,000,000?

Mr. BLANTON. But did the gentleman say that was to be permanent law and would provide $1,100,000 each and every year for all time and eternity?

Mr. GIBSON. The bill speaks for itself.

Mr. BLANTON. But I want you colleagues of ours, who are not on this committee, to understand that. This bill is an every-year affair. You are not just appropriating $1,100,000 for this year, but you are authorizing that sum to be appropriated each and every year from now on, as long as the Congress lasts and the Government stands. You would have to change this law to stop it; you would have to repeal this law to stop it, otherwise it keeps on annually, just like the sun rises every day.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Could you not put a limitation in the bill as to the number of years it shall be in effect?

Mr. BLANTON. Of course you could if you had enough votes; but with only a handful of Members here on the floor, the committee will not let you; the committee will not let you change their bill. Let me tell you what else you are doing, if you pass this bill. You are not only providing for buying parks and playgrounds in the District of Columbia, but you are authorizing them to go over across the Potomac River into the State of Virginia and buy some there. You are authorizing them to cross this District line over into the State of Maryland and buy some there.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why should you not if Maryland has something good?

Mr. BLANTON. Why should they not extend on down and buy some playgrounds in Texas?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I suspect they do own some in Texas.

Mr. WEFALD. And in Minnesota.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; in Minnesota. For Texas and Minnesota children to play on. Why do they not go up in Massachusetts and do the same thing?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Does not the gentleman know that in Wyoming there is a great national park, in Montana is another, another in California and Washington, and that all over this country there are national parks?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes. I will let the gentleman argue that in his own time. This is Washington, D. C., though, we are now discussing.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The Capital of the Nation.

Mr. BLANTON. The Capital of the Nation; that is right. But we already have numerous playgrounds here bought out of the Federal Treasury 100 per cent, many of them, and scattered all over this city. Go out here on Sixteenth Street NW., called the Avenue of the Presidents, out there across from Mrs. Henderson's residence, and there you will see that magnificent Meridian Hill playgrounds of about 10 acres that cost this Government approximately $490,000 as the initial cost, and yet not one penny was paid by the people of the District of Columbia. Every dollar of it came out of the Federal Treasury, and we have spent several thousand dollars upon it in fixing it up since then. Almost every year we have spent some money on it. Let me mention what this Government paid when buying a few of the parks:

Zoological Park, 170 acres, costing $200,000; Rock Creek Park, 1,640 acres, $1,200,000; Potomac River flats, addition, $26,684; Piney Branch parkway, 22 acres, $76,980; Montrose Park, 16 acres, $110,000; Fort Davis and Fort Dupont, 41 acres, $21,334; Rock Creek and Potomac parkway, 159 acres, $1,300,000.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; gladly.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Does the gentleman contend that the Government furnishes a million or more dollars every year to purchase and maintain the parks in this city and then gives to the District $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 besides?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; far more than that. I am going to tell you about some other bills this committee will call up for passage. I want to get some facts before you and then you will understand better what I am driving at. There is a bill already reported on this committee's calendar, and there is a similar one over in the Senate which it passed without debate, and the newspapers to-day say that Senator PHIPPS, of Colorado, is going to attach such legislation as a rider on the District of Columbia appropriation bill to take $4,438,154 out of the Public Treasury and give it to the District of Columbia as a so-called surplus due the District.

That is going to be given to them if the Senate passes it, and if that is given to them automatically, you know, it lowers the taxes of every taxpayer in this city pro tanto, for this sum of $4,438,154 they would otherwise have to get out of the people in taxes.

Let me call your attention to that proposition. Let me read you the act of Congress on that subject. The act of Congress passed June 29, 1922, provided:

A joint select committee, composed of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is created, and is authorized and directed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the United States since July 1, 1874—

Please note that they were to go back to July 1, 1874—with a view of ascertaining and reporting to Congress what sums have been expended by the United States and by the District of Columbia, respectively, whether for the purpose of maintaining, upbuilding, or beautifying the said District, or for the purpose of conducting its government or its governmental activities and agencies, or for the furnishing of conveniences, comforts, and necessities to the people of said District.

And so on.

Now, our former colleague from Nebraska, Mr. Evans, was a House member of that commission, and he filed one of the most comprehensive minority reports in connection with that proposition that I have ever read. I wish you would get it and read it. It is conclusive against this so-called surplus. I want to quote one or two excerpts from it to show you what he held.

He says, and I quote from Mr. Evans's minority report, the following:

The undersigned is unable to agree with the findings and conclusions of the majority of the committee for the following reasons:

(1) The construction of the act raising the committee as made by the majority report is erroneous, and the same objection lies as to the construction or effect of other acts bearing upon or affecting the matter investigated by the committee.

(2) The investigation made by the committee has covered neither the period nor the extent that Congress directed.

That is what your Representative in this House declared in his minority report. Listen:

(3) The finding by the majority of a balance or surplus of $4,438,154.92 as due to the District of Columbia is not supported by facts or law.

That is what your House commissioner, Mr. Evans, said in his minority report. He also says:

The alleged surplus reported by the majority of the committee is not based on such facts or information so gathered, because not all of such facts or information was gathered or searched for.

He further said:

The purpose Congress had in creating the joint select committee was to discover and report to Congress all facts bearing on the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia, hereinafter called the District, and the United States, hereinafter called the Government, in order that Congress might be able to determine the exact state of such fiscal relations.

Listen:

Such a discovery and report has not been made. * * * The act "authorizes and directs" inquiry into all matters pertaining to the fiscal relations between the District and the Government since July 1, 1874.

First. There is no question but that the act is mandatory. It is not left to the choice or desire of the committee, or a majority of the committee, to determine whether it is best, proper, or just to go into the subject matter presented for inquiry, and the act is equally specific as to the extent. It covers "all matters" pertaining to the fiscal relations * * * since July 1, 1874.

And he says they only went back to 1911 instead of going back to 1874, as the Congress directed, and yet that $4,438,154 is to be put on the District appropriation bill to-day as a legislative rider in another body and we are going to be called upon to swallow it without any investigation at all. That is not just to the taxpayers of the United States.

Let me call your attention to another thing. Just as soon as our friend from Maryland, or I should say our two friends from Maryland, pass this bill—and they can pretty nearly pass anything when they get together, because they are men of such prominence and influence. They can pass almost any kind of bill, and when they pass this bill they are not going to stop. Do you know what else they are going to do? They are not satisfied with this $1,100,000 annually for parks. They are going to immediately call up another park bill, and here is the other one. It just embraces $762,000 for more parks; that is all. For the Klingle Road valley park, $200,000; for the Piney Branch valley park, $155,000; for the area for widening the Piney Branch valley park west of Sixteenth Street, $107,000; and for a portion of the Patterson tract, $300,000; making $762,000 in that bill which they are going to pass. You are going to be called on to vote for it. Now, I went out and investigated these little park ends, and I want to show you something about them.

They claim that this particular $762,000 is necessary because after 6 o'clock in the afternoon this gate here [indicating by large photograph] is closed to the Zoo Park and they can not get from Rock Creek Park on the north through Zoo Park on the south and they must have an opening out of the west there in order to get through, as they want to have a park driveway clear through after 6 o'clock at night. You will notice this second photograph which I have had taken, and you will note that that gate could be kept open instead of closed, and I am going to show you that it can be kept open and not hurt anything at all. They say they have to lock this gate because they must keep people away from the animals in the Zoo Park. After you go into this gate, you go into this driveway [indicating by photograph] that follows Rock Creek down to the Mount Pleasant entrance of the Zoo Park, and in this second picture you see a high fence that runs along on the right fencing off the animals to the right until you get right down to this main Mount Pleasant entrance.

This is the second picture. You will notice that you go into that gate and they have a big iron fence on the right. If they will extend that iron fence 100 yards or 150 yards farther to where you see this junction of roads [indicating by photograph] and fence across this road off to the right, you would still have two roads off to the left, with all the animals fenced off to the right, and you would have two exits from the Zoo Park, one to the east up on Mount Pleasant Street and the other up by the residence of the superintendent of the Zoo Park, open all night long. If you will look at these three pictures, you will see that you can do that very thing without spending this money, buying $762,000 worth of park lands.

Let me show you the other little $200,000 item.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield? Do you know why you are asked to pay that much money for these tracts of land—because we did not do this 10 years ago.

Mr. BLANTON. We do not need it now.

Mr. LINTHICUM. We did not look far enough into the future.

Mr. BLANTON. We do not need it now. We can get through there without it. This is to benefit realtors who want to sell. If you will go out there and look at the physical facts, you will see that is true.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret; not just now. My time is running, and I want to get some more facts before you.

Here is a picture of the Klingle Valley Park. This is what they used to have in view. I would be in favor of buying, but Mr. Wardman has bought that property and has graded it and is fixing to build houses all over it. It is not contemplated to purchase that now at all. Here is what they are contemplating buying, this little point up here [indicating on picture]. It takes in just a little knob, and they are fixing to buy that. When I went out there and looked at that knob and then looked across the boulevard there, I saw this big, fine residence, and I said to myself, "The man who owns that mansion would like to see this knob fixed up as a park," and he would, and he is one of our particular friends who is putting both of these propositions through. The rules of the House prevent my mentioning his name.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Just name the State he lives in.

Mr. BLANTON. He hails from Colorado. He is not a Member of this body, and the rules do not let me mention his name. Here is the entrance to his magnificent residence out there on this avenue, and he is the one who is pushing both of these bills through, the surplus bill and the $762,000 park bill, so the Washington Post has stated. He is the main father of the surplus bill, you might say, and I find out that he owns and has $95,000 worth of property assessed to him here in the District of Columbia.

He has this fine residence and grounds facing 100 feet on Cathedral Avenue, and on Twenty-ninth Street northwest he has 543 feet frontage that could be cut off of the main residence grounds and not damage them any. The 543-foot frontage on Twenty-ninth Street are not needed for his residence grounds, and if you go out you will see the 543 feet has already been graded up apparently for building houses thereon. He could build 21 residences with 25 feet frontage each on Twenty-ninth Street and have some frontage on Twenty-ninth Street left over and not hurt his main residence grounds which front 100 feet on Cathedral Avenue. That property is assessed at $95,010; the residence part at $81,010, the tax upon the same being $972.12. Another portion is assessed at $7,000, and the tax on same is $84. Another portion is assessed at $7,000 and the tax upon that is $84. It makes a total assessment of $95,010 and he pays this year a tax of $1,140.12. These figures are correct, as they were given me by Mr. Richards, tax assessor of the District. If he paid the same tax rate that the people out in Denver, Colo., pay instead of paying the above tax, he would pay $2,622.27, or $1,482 more than he pays here this year. If he paid the same tax that the people in Baltimore pay, he would pay $3,106.82, or the sum of $1,966 more than he pays in Washington. This illustrates what a great saving it is to own your property in Washington, where the rate is $1.20 on the $100, than to own it elsewhere.

I want to say this to you: I am for making Washington the most beautiful city in the world. I am for taking every million dollars out of the Treasury of the United States for the Government to spend to do it that is justly needed, but I am not willing to continue taxing the already tax-burdened people of this country who have to pay their own large taxes at home to pay the civic expenses here and then let these specially favored, petted, pampered, selfish, spoiled people in Washington pay only $1.20 on the hundred and enjoy all the benefits of this great city at the expense of our constituents back home.

Take this magnificent $6,000,000 Congressional Library that would cost at least $15,000,000 now—is not it enjoyed by every citizen of the District? Take the magnificent Smithsonian Institution, the magnificent museums here, the art gallery, the magnificent parks, the magnificent playgrounds. Are not the people of the District of Columbia getting the benefit? And yet they want to tax the Government of the United States more than $8,000,000 a year, which the Cramton amendment offers them, for the very property that they enjoy hourly here in this District.

THE OLD SLOGAN HAS WORN THREADBARE

Whenever a Member of Congress seeks to change the unjust system of allowing the people of Washington to pay the ridiculous tax rate of only $1.20 on the $100, the newspapers and citizens' associations immediately resort to their old battle cry—

That Washington is the Nation's Capital and must be made the most beautiful city in the world; that the Government should pay a big part of the local city expenses because it owns so much property here.

Washington is the Nation's Capital and should be made the most beautiful city in the world, and I will go just as far as any other man through all legitimate and proper means to make it the most beautiful city in the world. Before the Government built all of its fine institutions here Washington was a mere village. Property here was of little value. It is because of the fact that the United States has spent its millions here that has caused some lots to jump in value from $100 to $100,000. Every piece of property owned by the Government in Washington is daily enjoyed by the people of Washington.

The local pay roll of the Government is a bonanza to the merchants and business enterprises of Washington. The Government pays its nearly 100,000 employees in Washington their wages promptly every two weeks in new money that has never been spent before. Chicago, or any other big city in the United States, would gladly exempt the Government from paying all taxes on its property to get it to move its capital to such city.

Because we want to make it the most beautiful city in the world is no reason why the Government should pay for building million-dollar school buildings and employing 2,500 teachers and buying the schoolbooks for the 70,000 school children of the thousands of families living in Washington who have no connection whatever with the Government except to bleed it on all occasions and to grow rich on the Government pay rolls expended here.

Because we want to make Washington the most beautiful city in the world is no reason why the Government should pay for the army of garbage gatherers, the army of ash gatherers, the army of trash gatherers, the army of street cleaners and sprinklers, the army of tree pruners and sprayers, and the street-lighting system for the several hundred miles of private residences owned by rich tax dodgers who have no connection whatever with the Government; nor is it any reason why the Government should pay for their water system, their sewer system, their police protection, their fire protection, for playgrounds for their children, for parks for their enjoyment, for their municipal golf grounds, for their numerous public tennis courts, for their bathing beaches, for their skating ponds, for their cricket grounds, for their baseball and football grounds, for their horseback riding paths, for paving the streets in front of their residences and maintaining and keeping them in repair, for building their million-dollar bridges, furnishing million-and-a-half-dollar market houses, their municipal trial and appellate courts, their jails and houses of correction, their municipal hospitals, asylums for their insane, special asylum schools for their deaf and dumb, asylums for their orphans, a university for their 110,000 colored people, their municipal libraries, their municipal community-center facilities, salaries of all their municipal officers, employees, buildings, furnishings, equipments, sanitary and health departments, and the hundreds of other things that all other cities of the United States must furnish and pay for themselves, but a very substantial part of which the people of Washington have been getting out of the Federal Treasury for years.

The magnificent Capitol and its beautiful grounds are daily enjoyed by Washington people. The Congressional Library, which cost $6,032,124, in addition to the sum of $585,000 paid for its grounds, and for the upkeep of which Congress annually spends a large sum of money, is daily enjoyed by the people of Washington. The Government furnished and maintains the magnificent Botanic Garden here for the pleasure and enjoyment of Washington people. The Government furnished and maintains the wonderful Zoo Park with all of its interesting animals, for the instruction and amusement of Washington children. The Government furnished and maintains the extensive and most beautiful Rock Creek Park, with its picturesque picnic grounds, its miles of wonderful boulevards, its incomparable scenery, all for the pleasure of Washington people. Congress has spent millions of dollars reclaiming and purchasing the lands now embraced in the Potomac Parks and Speedway, daily used and enjoyed by Washington people. The Government has spent several million dollars building the various bridges spanning the Potomac River and huge sums for the bridges spanning the Anacostia River, and spent $1,000,000 building the beautiful "million-dollar bridge" on Connecticut Avenue. The Government has spent millions of dollars on the Lincoln Memorial, grounds, and reflecting pools, the Washington Monument Grounds, Lincoln Park, on East Capitol Street, and the numerous beautiful little parks scattered all over the city, all for the pleasure and benefit of Washington people.

During the recess of Congress I wrote to the mayor of every city of any size in the United States and asked them to advise us of their local tax rates, of the charges for water, sewer, paving, and so forth, and what rate, in their judgment, they thought Washington people should pay as a minimum. I want to insert just a few in this report. The consensus of opinion was that the rate here should be at least $2.50 per $100, and there was a large per cent who were in favor of it being much higher, and the rates for taxation ranged from $2.75 to over $6.50, and in all these cities the people were charged more for water, sewer, and paving.

Let me again quote a few excerpts from the letter sent me by the mayor of the city of Peoria, Ill.:

[City of Peoria, Ill. Mayor's office. Edward N. Woodruff, mayor]
NOVEMBER 1, 1923.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Representative, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Answering your questionnaire of October 15, concerning relative tax rates of the cities of Washington and Peoria:

The tax rates on each $100 taxable valuation levied against the real and personal property of the citizens of Peoria for the year 1922 is itemized as follows:

City corporate tax, including library, tuberculosis, garbage, and police and fire pension fund	$1.94
Street and bridge	.24
School district	2.70
Park district	.41
		$5.29
State	.45
County	.59
County highway	.25
		1.29
Total, all purposes		6.58

Unless there is a tremendous revenue derived from sources other than from taxes, the rate of $1.20 for Washington is ridiculous. While I have never had my attention called to this disparity, I am amazed that the light has not been let into financial affairs of the Capital City long before this time.

You should be supported by every colleague in your effort to compel the citizens of Washington to do theirs, even as every citizen outside the District is doing his.

Wishing you success, I am,

Very truly yours, E. N. WOODRUFF, Mayor.

The foregoing statement from the mayor of Peoria, Ill., fairly indicates the sentiment of the people over the United States. It might be enlightening to quote from a few of the letters received the tax rates of some of the cities over the United States as certified to me by the mayors of such cities.

When I speak of the tax rate of these cities I, of course, mean their total tax—State, county, school, and municipal—which is the total tax citizens of those respective cities have to pay on their property, as compared with the $1.20 on the $100 rate Washington people have to pay in the District of Columbia.

The tax rate paid by the people in Baltimore, Md., $3.27 on the $100; in New Orleans, La., $3.16½ on the $100; in Portland, Oreg., $4.52 on the $100; in my birthplace, Houston, Tex., $4.29½ on the $100; in Ogden, Utah, $3.33 on the $100; in Cheyenne, Wyo., $3.75 on the $100; in Fort Smith, Ark., $3.32 on the $100; in New Bedford, Mass., $3.13; in Burlington, Vt., $3.10 on the $100; in Pittsburgh, Pa., $3.22 on the $100; in St. Louis, Mo., which is a distinct political subdivision of the State, the city tax is $2.43 on the $100; in Boston, Mass., $2.47 on the $100; in Rochester, N. Y., $3.36 on the $100; in Portland, Me., $3.40 on the $100; in Boise City, Idaho, $4.29 on the $100; in Mobile, Ala., $3.40 on the $100; in Detroit, Mich., $2.75 per $100; in Duluth, Minn., $5.79 on the $100; in Atlanta, Ga., $3.15 on the $100; in Kansas City, Mo., $2.93 on the $100; in Minneapolis, Minn., $6.52 on the $100; in Salt Lake City, Utah, $3.18 on the $100; in Oakland, Calif., $4.02 on the $100; in Austin, the capital of Texas, $3.54 on the $100; in Denver, Colo., $2.76 on the $100; in Trenton, N. J., $3.22 on the $100; in Racine, Wis., $2.87 on the $100; in Nashville, Tenn., $2.80 on the $100; in Charlottesville, Va., $2.85. And let me illustrate as the tax rate runs generally over Texas: In Paris, Tex., $4.10 on the $100; in Port Arthur, Tex., $3.54 on the $100; in Tyler, Tex., $4.61 on the $100; in Denison, Tex., $3.32 on the $100; in Waco, Tex., $3.03 on the $100; in Amarillo, Tex., $3.55 on the $100; in Temple, Tex., $3.15; in Wichita Falls, Tex., $5.05 on the $100; in Beaumont, Tex., $4.04.

Mr. Edward F. Bryant, tax collector for San Francisco, Calif., has sent me a statement certifying that the following is the tax rate paid by the citizens in the following cities: In Seattle, Wash., $8.80 on the $100; Chicago, Ill., $8 on the $100; in Reno, Nev., $7.38 on the $100; in New York, N. Y., $5.48 on the $100; in Philadelphia, Pa., $6 on the $100; in Detroit, Mich., $4.48 on the $100; in San Francisco, Calif., $3.47 on the $100; in Los Angeles, Calif., $3.89 on the $100.

What excuse have we to offer to our constituents back at home who are paying the above tax rates for permitting by our votes here the 437,000 people in Washington, D. C., to continue paying the measly little pittance of only $1.20 on the $100, based on a half to two-thirds valuation, when our constituents have to pay all the balance of the expenses of this great city?

Numerous millionaires live in Washington, having no connection with the Government, merely to get the benefit of the low taxes. You may offer all the excuses available, but we are responsible, for we could change this system, but we do not do it. Some of you will claim that "this is not the time." But it is the time, if you so ordained it, and voted now to change it.

Some of the finest people in the world live in Washington; they are selfish, but still they are fine people. [Laughter.] You can not hardly blame them; they have been sponging on the Government for years. They are making a strenuous fight now to continue the 60-40 system. They must have these hand-outs from the Government. I am in favor of making them pay not what our people pay but $2.75 or $2.50 per $100 at least. I would be satisfied with $2.50. Let them pay $2.50 on the $100 like they used to pay, and let them pay on a full valuation instead of half, and then take every bit of the balance of the expense out of the Federal Treasury, and I am then willing to go the limit with you. I only want them to pay a decent, reasonable, fair tax.

Let me call your attention to another photograph I have had taken. Here is what they want you to pay $155,000 for—a little hole in the ground out there under the Tiger Bridge on Sixteenth Street. Do you know why? They have built new houses all around it. They now want the Government to spend $155,000 for it, and then fix it up into a beautiful park for the benefit of these people who have bought these new residences. It is a real-estate proposition.

Go out here to the Tiger Bridge and look to the right at that sink hole. They want the Government to spend thousands of dollars fixing it up so that it will not look so unsightly to all those people who have paid big prices for residences around it. That is what you are doing or are going to do in the second park bill that comes up here with $762,000 appropriation in it.

I want now to call your attention to how unfairly anyone is treated who makes a fight on these propositions. When we had a hearing before our committee on May 7, 1924, they were going to vote out this so-called surplus bill without any hearing. I insisted upon a hearing, and they provided for it, but said that it must be reported back to the committee by the following Wednesday. The next committee meeting was the 14th, and the subcommittee did not meet to begin this hearing until the 12th of May, which was just two days before we had to report. We were thus given only an hour and a half or two hours before the House met on two days to have this hearing. I went before the subcommittee to produce some of the evidence that I wanted to introduce against this $4,438,154 bill. I knew that I could not go into the matter very thoroughly, but I did want to show that the matter had not been properly investigated and that no surplus was due. I had not been speaking for five minutes before some member said he did not want one member of the committee taking up all of the time and insisted on somebody else having some time. As I was the only one voting against it, I saw immediately that there was not a chance on earth to get the facts in there, and I said, "Gentlemen, I will place my facts in a minority report; I will not try to fight it out here, because there is not a chance to get the evidence in." But I had already made the following remarks, and I quote from the hearings:

There is a Texas man with large southern interests who owns the Meridian Mansions, at 2400 Sixteenth Street, which is assessed at something over $1,400,000—less than $1,500,000. I have a statement from Mr. Kirby Smith, who owns it, that he gave $2,250,000 for it, and that he has spent quite a large sum in improving that property, and that the improvements alone could not be placed there for $3,000,000, let alone the land, and yet he is assessed at less than $1,500,000.

After I left the room the following, among other things, occurred. The only witness on earth they heard was Mr. Donovan, the auditor at the District Building, who is a District of Columbia man, working for this proposition, favorable to this proposition, a taxpayer in the District, and was there seeking to have this surplus allowed. He was not against it. He said:

Mr. Chairman, with permission I would like to make one short statement for the record to answer a statement made by Mr. BLANTON; yesterday regarding the valuation of Meridian Mansions at 2400 Sixteenth Street. You will recall one statement made by Mr. BLANTON, and if you do not object, I would like to make a reply from our assessor's end of it.

Mr. KUNZ. A gentleman from Texas owns that place?

Mr. DONOVAN. I understand Mr. Kirby Smith, the present owner of the property, is from Louisiana and not Texas.

Mr. KUNZ. He said he expended $2,000,000 on the property and is only paying taxes on $800,000.

Get that, gentlemen. He claimed that I had said that Mr. Smith had put $2,000,000 in improvements on the property and was paying taxes on only $800,000. That is not my statement. My statement was that he had given $2,250,000 for it; that he had spent some money in improving it; and that the improvements, all of the improvements, not merely what he put on it, were worth $3,000,000, exclusive of the land, and that it was taxed at less than $1,500,000. I also stated that I had a letter from Mr. Kirby Smith, and I want to read you one or two excerpts from that letter. The letter is dated at Meridian Mansions, 2400 Sixteenth Street, Washington, D. C., February 1, 1924, and is addressed to me:

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: In the Washington Daily News of January 28, under the heading of "Properties underassessed," I note that you list Meridian Mansions Hotel at 2400 Sixteenth Street. This is property purchased by me on January 1 of last year. The writer is at this time the president of the Louisiana Society of Washington, and for six years I was a director in the Federal reserve bank at Dallas—

You gentlemen know where Dallas is, do you not? It is in Texas.

To continue, I read further from his letter the following:

The usual assessment on property is 50 per cent of the valuation. This property could not be replaced for less than $3,000,000, in addition to the land, but on account of the operations of the Rent Commission and the low rental value of property, it was sold to me for $2,250,000. I have spent quite a fortune refurnishing and building over the place to make it attractive.

Then, after some other things, he signs his name E. Kirby Smith; and yet after I was misquoted in the committee room the various afternoon papers said that I had claimed that Mr. Smith had spent $3,000,000 on this property in improvements, and that it was assessed for only $600,000. The newspapers thus misrepresented me.

I said that Mr. E. Kirby Smith was from Texas. He was for six years a Federal reserve bank director at Dallas, Tex. The paper said I claimed him from Texas, when, as a matter of fact, he was from Louisiana. In that way they tried to discredit me. That is the way these Washington newspapers do when you oppose them. If you fight this thing, that is the way they treat you, but I do not pay any attention to them. I do not get up here like my friend from California [Mr. MACLAFFERTY] and call them to time every time they make a statement about me. I let them go on.

Let me tell you this about the newspapers: They are good fellows if they like you, but just you stand between them and something that they want and they will knife you, they will hound you, they will tell lies about you, they will misconstrue you, they will misrepresent you every chance they get. That is their business. They could not exist if they did not do that. They are working for the people of Washington. I am for making the people of Washington pay a fair tax rate of at least $2.50 on the hundred, instead of just $1.20 on the $100. The people of Washington do not want to pay it, and they and their newspapers are trying to hound me to keep me from fighting for the things that I believe are right. You know it works on some fellows. Just keep hounding them and they will quit, but I am not a quitter.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is a rather long one. The gentleman has made several allusions to the tax rate in Baltimore I have often wondered why the gentleman does not take up another proposition in the District of Columbia. Baltimore spent $35,000,000 upon the construction of a sewerage system and a plant so that not one quart of water should go into the Patapsco River that had not passed through this system, and yet here in the District of Columbia you have a sewerage system dumping into the Potomac River raw sewage, destroying all the food fish and the oysters of the lower river.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know why the gentleman does not touch on that subject.

Mr. BLANTON. I will touch on that. I wish you would investigate like I have and get the figures on the amount of money your taxpayers contribute every year for this sewer system in Washington. Do you know back home they pay so much per month for sewer connections in most of the States? Here you get sewer connection for a nominal sum. I have Mr. Donovan's—the auditor—statement that the people here pay only a small per cent of the actual cost, that they pay $1.50 a front foot; that is all. If they own 20 feet, they pay $30 and nothing after that for sewer connection. The service is furnished free thereafter for life. And so with water. They get it for $2 per front foot. They get it lots cheaper here because the people pay very little of the expense of it. It is paid out of the Treasury. Let me tell you another thing. Do you know there is pending now before the committee and probably will be called up pretty soon, or it will be reported and probably called up because you can not stop it—there is a bill here for damming the Potomac River and spending $44,000,000 so that the people here can obtain cheaper lighting? You are going to be called upon to vote for that, and they will stick it on an appropriation bill some time as a rider. You have just given away that splendid Muscle Shoals plant which was considered a white elephant on our hands. I did not vote to give it away, however.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It has not been given away yet.

Mr. BLANTON. By the action of the House it has been given to Henry Ford for 100 years, and now we are to be called upon to build a $44,000,000 plant up here that some of the expert engineers of this city assure me instead of costing $44,000,000 will cost at least $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 before the Government can get out of it. Let me call your attention to the fact that when the Army first attempted to build Muscle Shoals they estimated that all three dams would cost only $19,500,000, and then after we appropriated the first few million dollars for them they came back with the next estimate that the Wilson Dam, No. 2, alone would cost $25,000,000, and then the next estimate was the Wilson Dam, No. 2, would cost $35,000,000, and the latest estimate we have now is that the Wilson Dam, No. 2, alone will cost $45,000,000, while the original estimate of the War Department engineers was that all three dams, all told, would cost only $19,500,000. So you see you can not depend upon these War Department estimates. You are going to be called upon soon to vote for this $44,000,000. These newspapers here are hounding you about it already, with editorials and articles in the paper furthering that cause, and, incidentally, sticking me with pins and needles, pricking me because I am fighting it.

Mr. WEFALD. It does not hurt the gentleman any.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not hurt me with people who know me, not the people at home who know me; it does not hurt me at all.

Mr. WEFALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. WEFALD. On this question of publicity, is it not a fact that a man who gets very much favorable publicity from these newspapers in some way, directly or indirectly, pays for it?

Mr. BLANTON. Possibly so. I will tell the gentleman what I would like. You know I wish every one of these boys here in the gallery was my friend. I would lots rather have complimentary notices from them than such notices as I sometimes get.

I would like to be their friend. I am simply doing my duty here. If I did not stand in the way of something they want they would be my friends, for personally they are all nice fellows. Why, they come in my office and sit down and we have a nice friendly discussion. I show them every courtesy possible, but they give me the very old Nick every time I fight their projects.

Mr. WEFALD. And the gentleman gives it back.

Mr. BLANTON. But I do not get mad. I am still in a good humor with them. Now, I want to say this in conclusion, for I have taken up more time than I intended. This is a matter we must determine, and we can not determine it properly until we get the Members to know the facts, because most of our colleagues are off somewhere else. You 40 men now on the floor this afternoon have the information about this bill, and these problems, but others are away. Men think the committee members have passed on these bills, and vote for a bill and do not know what it is about half the time. I hope that when the Senate sends an appropriation bill back here with an improper rider on it that keeps up this pernicious 60–40 system in the way it has been going on, every Member here ought to stick like a stone wall until we remove such rider from the appropriation bills and let these legislative matters come up on their merits.

I am going to offer an amendment here to this park bill to provide that those funds shall come out of the District of Columbia. There is where it ought to come from. The Government has spent enough already for this park service and for these District playgrounds. If they want additional parks and playgrounds over in Maryland or Virginia let them take the money out of the District funds to pay for them and not take it out of the money of the people of the United States. Gentlemen, I submit the question to you. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL.]

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has gone rather far afield in discussing this bill. He has an obsession—and I do not know that I quarrel with him on it—regarding the tax rate in the District of Columbia. In spite of myself I find myself in accord with the gentleman from Texas more than 90 per cent of the time, and he is rather unfortunate that his methods are such that his hard work and his research do not meet with greater approval from the membership of the House. That is his lookout, however, and not mine. The taxes of the District have nothing to do with this bill or his personal quarrel. The gentleman from Colorado who owns a residence out here has nothing to do with this bill. There is no use in appealing to the prejudices or the passions of Members of Congress in order to drive home a point, nor is this bill the place for it.

If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] will bring in a bill or if he will attach some sort of a rider to an appropriation bill fixing the tax rate for the District of Columbia I will be with him, but we can not take a proposition such as this and adjudicate or settle the tax problem of the District of Columbia. That is not what it is drawn for. Nor can the Members of the House who are engaged in committee work on other important subjects follow all of the hearings and all of the business that comes before the District of Columbia Committee. We are serving as a board of aldermen to hear these various questions and to give our best judgment on them. As I said before, I find myself in accord with the gentleman from Texas on about 90 per cent of the bills that come before us. What is this bill and what does it do? This bill is for the preservation of the flood waters in Rock Creek and to prevent the pollution of water in Rock Creek, the Potomac and Anacostia Rivers. It is partially a health measure. It is for the protection of the Congressmen and the Congressmen's guests who come here to visit them, just as much as it is for the people of the District of Columbia.

And may I say that this $8,000,000 which is contemplated and embodied in the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is based upon the valuation of the property which the Government owns in the District of Columbia. In other words, a fair inventory has been made, I suppose, of the property of the Government in the District of Columbia, and then under the tax rate which is assessed upon the people who live in the District of Columbia, the private individuals, the Government, if it were assessed at a fair valuation, would pay about $8,000,000 to the District of Columbia. Now, if we can get that through, I will support it. I will support the gentleman from Texas on such a proposition as I have supported the gentleman from Michigan. Then it makes no difference to us or to our constituents how much money they spend in the District for local improvements. But these propositions here are more than local improvements.

I do not know how many of you have guests who come to this Capital, but ever since the snows of last winter disappeared, the streets and the hotels have been crowded with people from all over the United States who have come here to visit this beautiful city and to learn what we do here and what there is to see here.

Now, the policy of the Government is to go down into Texas, if they have something particularly beautiful down there or particularly strange or unique, and to make reservations for the people of the whole Nation. We have gone into Wyoming, and those of you who have not had an opportunity to visit Yellowstone Park have lost a wonderful thrill. We go into Montana and establish Glacier Park; we go out into California and preserve the great trees. It is true they have no such unique things here in Washington, but they have a number of beautiful valleys, a number of beautiful ravines, a number of beautiful knolls, wooded, with little streams trickling down through them, beautiful recrention places for the people who come to Washington just as they are for the people who live in Washington. Now, those knolls are being dug down by gigantic steam shovels; the earth is being moved and the ravines are being filled, and you have remaining a flat, unattractive, clay-colored country in place of the beautiful, picturesque, and delightful places which you once had.

You are drying up the sources of those little creeks by cutting off the woodland, and day after day and day after day you find what the realty men would call the improvement of these tracts. I do not consider them improvements. If you are going to preserve them for the generations that are to come, and if you are going to conserve the health and happiness of the people of the city of Washington, who are citizens in spite of the fact that they have not the vote; if you are going to have a beautiful city in Washington for your constituents to visit and enjoy and be proud of, you have got to take the chance now, get this land and preserve it before it is covered with buildings, necessary as they may be in some portions of the city of Washington.

Now, it is hardly fair to misrepresent the situation. It made an impression upon the gentleman from Minnesota; it made an impression upon other Members, but just read the bill and see what the bill provides. It is to preserve the forests and natural scenery in and around Washington. Is there any reason why we should not do that because the people of Washington pay a tax rate of only $1.20? Not a bit. We might raise the taxes of the people of the city of Washington, but we should not deprive the whole Nation of the opportunity to preserve the forest and natural scenery about the city of Washington.

It is to provide for a systematic and continuous development of the park, parkway, and playground system of the National Capital. Is that any different from what they do in your own State? The States have taken it up as a necessary part of their functions and activities. In every progressive State in the Nation, including the State of Texas, they are providing playgrounds for their children and parks for their people.

Do you know what it does further? The commission is authorized and directed to acquire such lands as in its judgment shall be necessary and desirable in the District of Columbia and adjacent areas in Maryland and Virginia, within the limits of the appropriations made for such purposes, for suitable development of the National Capital park, parkway, and playground system, and that is a perfectly sound proposition. Why confine the bill to the very limited area of the District of Columbia? You have got to go further out. You must provide playgrounds for the people who are going to occupy these great houses and great apartment houses, cooped up, in one, two, or three little rooms. Do you not think that is a good proposition for the future health and prosperity of the people of this Nation? You have got to provide some place for them to play, some place for recreation, and some place where they can go out and breathe God's pure air that has not been used over and over again as the air in this room has been used, and you go home night after night, with headaches because of the vileness of the atmosphere.

The more parks and the more playgrounds we can get now the cheaper it is going to be for the Nation, the cheaper it is going to be for the District, and the more beneficial it is going to be for the people as a whole.

It is not fair to draw a distinction between your home and my home where we pay, as we do in my own city, $3.50 tax on $100 instead of the $1.20 paid here. The situation is different. I have had hundreds of guests in Washington during this spring and to the last man, woman, and child they are proud of the Nation's Capital, and you are only asking 1 cent from each and every one of those people to support the playgrounds and parks, to extend them, and to protect them.

Mr. BLANTON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want the gentleman to answer one question. What particular halo is there about the heads of Garfinkle, Woodward & Lothrop, and John Poole, the man I do my banking business with, the president of the Federal American National Bank, who have no connection with this Government, that they should live here and enjoy all these pleasant surroundings and pay a tax of only $1.20 when our people have to pay three times that much.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman and I have no quarrel on that at all, but he brings it in at the wrong place.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, where is the right place?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The right place is to introduce a bill covering that proposition and not try to defeat every proposition for the improvement of the Nation's Capital by bringing that in and repeating the same statements over and over again and putting them in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Did not my colleague make a point of order against an amendment I have offered proposing to change the tax rate to $2.50?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; because it was not the place for it.

Mr. BLANTON. It was on a legislative bill dealing with taxation.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It was on this bill, and it is no place for it. If the gentleman would pay a little less attention to the RECORD—I do not want to criticize him unjustly, but if he would pay less attention to the RECORD, and if he would get all this data together, as he has, and the gentleman has spent an immense amount of time and effort in doing it, and then present it in a concrete form to the Members of the House, I believe he would have the support of practically every Member.

Mr. BLANTON. I tried to do that this evening.

Mr. UNDERHILL. But the gentleman selects the wrong place and the wrong time. That is the trouble about it.

Mr. BLANTON. It is always the wrong time.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And he is all the time bringing it up at the wrong time. Why does he not go about this matter as he does other matters and bring in a bill covering the proposition instead of trying to defeat legislation like this which is of real value not only to the people of the District but to the people of the Nation.

I want to commend the work of the gentleman from Texas. I have tried to pay him a little tribute. There is no harder worker on the floor of the House or in committee, but the trouble is he never sticks to one line. He never brings in his arguments in the right place. He is trying to get something into the RECORD which has no connection whatever with the bill under discussion.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I yield.

Mr. BEGG. I notice the bill provides an appropriation of $1,000,000 a year indefinitely—100 years, for instance.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Is that necessary?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not at all. The gentleman can offer an amendment providing a limit of 20 years or any subsequent Congress, when they find this development has gone far enough, can cut it off altogether. We had to have some appropriation authorized.

Mr. BEGG. I am serious about it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I know the gentleman is serious about it.

Mr. BEGG. If we appropriate $1,000,000 a year to buy land, it will not be very long before we own one-half of the State of Virginia and one-half of the State of Maryland.

Mr. UNDERHILL. This amount is necessary just now and I am sure the gentleman would not have us put it at $100,000.

Mr. BEGG. Why do you not make it $1,000,000 for five years?

Mr. UNDERHILL. All right; offer that as an amendment and I am willing to consider it.

Mr. BEGG. I think it is wrong the way it is.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Let us have constructive criticism. Let us have suggestions offered to limit the length of time, but let us not condemn the whole bill because, forsooth, Garfinkle, or Wardman, or somebody else only pays $1.20 a hundred taxes in the city of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am heartily in favor of this bill. I think, perhaps, there ought to be some amendment by which the appropriation is limited to a certain number of years so that the aggregate amount would be sufficient to purchase the necessary land for parks. I feel just at this time it is a very important matter for the city of Washington and for the United States, it being the capital thereof, to acquire sufficient grounds in and about the District of Columbia to provide proper parks.

The gentleman from Texas mentioned a bill which is to come up, I hope, soon after this bill, appropriating certain funds for the purchase of land to extend the present park system. The amount of money provided in that bill is rather large. It is large because the very bill now under discussion was not passed some 10 years ago. If the bill under discussion had been passed some 10 years ago, the very land that we propose to purchase in the other bill could have been bought for at least one-fifth or perhaps at the highest one-third the amount which is now proposed.

We all have heard in years passed about the old Tweed ring in New York, and we remember how it was said they robbed the city of New York, but everybody will recognize the fact that the purchase of the great Central Park in the city of New York by the Tweed ring officials outnumbers in millions of dollars in value and advantages to the city of New York all the money that the Tweed ring ever filched from its treasury. Think of what New York would be without Central Park.

The passage of this bill will provide for the city of Washington protection of its water supply, sufficient land for a park system, sufficient for playgrounds, and it will be a well-thought-out plan, which we have never had. If anyone will go out here to the Anacostia River below Bennings Bridge and see what can be done with an old stream, nothing but mud flats before it was dredged and walled, they will realize the great importance of a properly thought-out park system and the advantages of systematic extension work. It will eventually provide a beautiful water front park and playground for the city.

The gentleman from Texas mentioned the fact that they are going into Maryland. It is almost impossible to go anywhere in the District of Columbia where there are no houses, and it is necessary to go into Maryland and Virginia, for the District is almost filled. You can not go from Chevy Chase Circle to the Chevy Chase Club without going into Maryland, and you can not go far beyond Bennings Bridge without going into Maryland. Maryland is not anxious for the District of Columbia to purchase land within her borders, because every mite of land that the District purchases makes so much less taxable land for Maryland and results proportionately in more taxes for the people of Maryland to pay. Maryland is interested in the city of Washington just as if it was a part of the State of Maryland.

In and about the District of Columbia at this time there are 100,000 acres of land, much of which can be bought at a mighty low rate. If a park system is devised, and if this land was purchased, in 10 years, if Congress should change its mind, it would receive five times as much as it will pay to-day. But if you delay for a few years—towns are springing up all around the District—the advantages of living near the Capital of the United States, such as the advantages derived by being at the educational center, the libraries, galleries, legislative halls, and so forth—all these things are bringing hundreds of people to and around the District of Columbia. This vast territory, beautiful in scenery, magnificent waterfalls, great woodlands, wonderful streams, wonderful views, can be purchased to-day at a very cheap price, indeed. As I have said, if we propose to wait we will have to pay a tremendously large sum for it. Why, gentlemen, this city is growing; it is the Capital of the world's great democracy; it is visited by thousands of American citizens. Shall we provide less for them than did the old monarchies and empires? It would be a crime to let these wonderful woodlands be despoiled and this scenery obliterated.

I belong to what is known as the Southern Maryland Society, composed of men who were raised around the District of Columbia, people who know southern Maryland, people who know the District of Columbia, people who know the possibilities in and around the District of Columbia for park purposes.

Mr. William M. Ellicott, one of our foremost advocates of a national park about Washington, addressed the Southern Maryland Society on the subject, as result of which the president, Mr. Alexander H. Robertson, appointed a committee, consisting of Messrs. Robert Crain, J. Spence Howard, T. Howard Duckett, William L. Marbury, R. Keith Compton, George Weems Williams, T. Rowland Thomas, and myself, to consider and to advocate its adoption. These gentlemen have studied this question thoroughly, and they approve this bill, because they believe it to be a great thing for the city of Washington to have a proper park system.

Look at other countries. Take France, with parks of thousands of acres, beautiful scenery, wonderful roads, and what a great advantage the people of France and the people of that great metropolis, Paris, receive from its wonderful parks in and around Paris. Just for a botanical garden. Look at Rio de Janeiro. There they have 2,000 acres; New York has 400 acres; Rhodesia, South Africa, 400 acres; Kew Gardens, London, 288 acres; Calcutta, India, 272 acres, and so on. Just for botanical gardens. The great cities of the world, older by hundreds of years than we are, realize the fact that the purchase of land in and around great cities for recreation purposes and for health and the protection of water supply is a most important object. England has seen proper to lay out and beautify her wonderful park of 90,000 acres, the pride of the empire.

The bill which we have does not fall very heavily on anybody. It is to be appropriated out of the funds of the District of Columbia in the Treasury on the same basis as other appropriations are provided for.

While I agree with the gentleman from Texas that perhaps taxes in the District of Columbia are not high enough, and the people ought to pay a larger proportion of this fund, that is no reason why we should not appropriate for a park system and for facilities for children and grown-ups.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If you will do one thing, if you will raise the rates of taxation to $2.50, which is less than $3.27 that you people pay, you will never hear another word from me against the District.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is not a question of paying $2.50. I think the Government property in the District of Columbia ought to be appraised; we ought to know what it is worth just as we know what the Wardman property is worth and the property of other people the gentleman has referred to, and then the United States Government should pay a proper tax on the property owned, and the expenses of other Federal activities and operations, and then let the people pay the balance, whether it is $1.20 or $2.20 or $2.50. There is no reason why they should pay any more than is necessary for the District. What we pay has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think the Government ought to pay taxes on this great Rock Creek Park, enjoyed by everybody?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think the Government ought to pay a substantial part just as the gentleman from Massachusetts, who spoke previous to me, said. Hundreds of people from all over the country have flocked into Washington this spring. The hotel where I stop has been crowded, and every hotel in the city has been crowded by people from every section of the United States who come here to visit the National Capital. I think these things can be properly worked out, but that is no reason why we should not have these parks and woods and the beautiful scenery to protect our water supply—that is no reason why we should not do it at this time and take advantage of the present situation.

I look upon this bill as the most progressive piece of legislation passed in the interest of the city of Washington and District of Columbia for many years. It will provide a systematic park planning for the future, which can be gradually worked out as the appropriations become available. I feel, as my friend Mr. Ellicott has said, that there should be a great park stretching from Washington to the Patapsco River near Baltimore, taking in those beautiful branches of the Little and Big Patuxent Rivers, embracing at Savage what is known as the Little and Middle Patuxent. The Great Falls of the Potomac and the Palisades of the Potomac should become a part of this park system. There should be a cooperation between Maryland, the city of Baltimore, and the District of Columbia through which the beautiful scenery of not alone the Patuxent and Potomac Rivers should be protected but likewise those lovely stretches along the Patapsco River. This park could be wide or narrow, as the topographical conditions might dictate. The greater part of it would embrace land useless for other than park purposes; some parts should be reforested, and as the timber matures the park could be made self-sustaining largely through the sale of timber, which should be cleared and new trees planted. We must realize that since the advent of automobiles and the great motor busses citizens can resort to the recesses of the forest and stream without much difficulty, to their great advantage from a health and recreation standpoint. With the present congestion of traffic, small parks become areas of pleasure. The increase of population, the advance in prices for farm and forest lands require immediate action. The bill before us is that progressive action which I believe will mean so very much for the District of Columbia. Washington, the Capital of the Nation, should not alone be beautiful but it should be the model of all American cities. Through its example our people should be led to great things in city planning. We are building for the future as well as the present.

As I have said, Mr. William M. Ellicott, at Baltimore, has been a great advocate for a National Capital forest and has been a great supporter of the measure now under consideration. It gives me great pleasure, therefore, with the consent of this House, to insert his article on the subject:

A NATIONAL CAPITAL FOREST

(By William M. Ellicott)

The object of this paper is to recommend the creation of a national forest for demonstration and experiment and as a setting for the United States Capital. Such a forest would be a fitting background, worthy of the dignity of the Nation's seat of government, and would give continuity and variety to the impression gained from the magnificence of buildings, boulevards, and monuments of the city proper.

Some of the Western States are happy in having areas set aside as national forests and national parks, and national forests are now to be established in the East, in the northern and southern Appalachian Mountains. We look also to Biltmore, in North Carolina, as a great achievement, and should view it as an object lesson in practical application of the principles of forestry to private lands. All these examples, however, are unfortunate in one respect—their remoteness from the main traveled routes, rendering them inaccessible to the vast majority of our people, for whom they exist but as shadows, exerting the minimum of influence in their daily life.

The necessities of the present time are such as to demand a full and thorough demonstration of the possibilities of the management of forests and their rehabilitation.

The experience of European nations illustrates, first, the dangers arising from denudation and, second, the commercial value of reforestation when it is done under scientific management.

The use of forests by the people becomes a habit which inures to the benefit of the whole population, adding to its vigor and zest of life.

Agricultural expansion in America has left certain areas unconquered because of their unfitness for cultivation, and in some of these rests the hope of future generations. One of these tracts, though sadly mutilated, has remained to our day a vast forest useful for no other purpose. Providentially also, it exists in a place which above all others should recommend it for protection and improvement to the people of the United States. It forms the background of the National Capital, beginning at the bounding line of the District of Columbia at Bladensburg and extending northeast nearly 20 miles until it crosses the Patuxent River, a tract of 41,000 acres, while separated from it by a narrow strip between Washington and Laurel, there is another body of 16,000 acres. Beyond the Patuxent it swings eastward, touching the Severn and South Rivers, and reaching the outskirts of Annapolis, the seat of the United States Naval Academy, and thereby adds another area of 43,000 acres.

Another forest district of vital importance to the Nation's Capital, containing some grand scenery which, though separated from the main bodies by the breadth of Montgomery County should be included in the purchase, borders the banks of the Potomac River from the District line to a point beyond the Great Falls, an area of 10,000 acres. Conditions here are distressing in the extreme, as no effort has so far been made to care for it, and year by year injury to the landscape is done. Surely devotion to the public welfare should prompt Congress to protect this great possession.

The value of the lands in question is comparatively small, but as the pressure of population increases this will not continue, and it is not wise to defer provision for its purchase. Altogether these areas cover 110,000 acres. The Forest Service should ascertain the merits of the various districts for forest purposes and study the replanting of certain parts, and a commission should plan for the maximum of beauty and utility, which are lost for want of skillful and intelligent handling.

Watercourses should be improved and artificial lakes could be made as beautiful as natural ones, and the attraction of the woods may be enhanced by the erection of suitable buildings properly located. A structure of the character of a small chateau to serve the traveling public as an inn or automobile club would not be out of keeping.

Here, then, at the gateway to the Capital lies a splendid domain such as the kings of the earth from the earliest time have taken for themselves and jealously guarded as among their dearest possessions. We see it in the New Forest in England, with its 90,000 acres—established by the Conqueror—in Fontainbleau also, and in that one which existed in the shadowy past within the present borders of the city of Paris, of which the Louvre retains the name of the king's hunting lodge of that day.

Many other forests might be mentioned, as, for instance, that proud possession of the city of Zurich, given to it by Charlemagne.

Looking, then, for a moment at the forest through the silver birches among the laurels and into the hemlocks beyond, or turning about and gazing across a lake over the receding hills at sunset, you may in spirit visualize what you have many times seen with the eye of the flesh and thus discern what the people may do for themselves and why they should do it for their own well-being and for the benefit of generations to come.

At the southern apex of the territory indicated is the old town of Bladensburg and neighboring hamlets. Here are found historic specimens of colonial architecture—the Calvert mansion, the inn at which General Washington used to rest when he was planning the great city, and Parthenon Heights, a quaint old house of Revolutionary days. It is here that the two main branches of the Anacostia River meet, the one stream coming down from Tacoma Park, near the northern corner of the District of Columbia, and the other, or Northeastern Branch, emerging from the principal forest areas with which we have to do. The road leaving Bladensburg crosses the Anacostia Bridge and arrives soon at the border of the forest, and after traversing several miles of interesting country the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad is reached. It then turns north and enters the forest again, passing through spruce, pine, oak, and poplar, all of which under present ownership is kept thinned out as it becomes of commercial value in the local market for timber, railroad ties, pulp, or firewood.

Reference to the accompanying map, which is made from detailed charts of the forest areas of the Maryland Forest Department, will show that the District is approached by numerous electric and steam railways as well as by county and turnpike roads.

On approaching the height of land between Anacostia and the Patuxent watersheds there are hills of considerable height. Thence one descends rapidly to the Patuxent River Valley, across which the forest still continues, reaching out toward the Patapsco, whose 20 miles of lovely nature extend from the harbor of Baltimore to Relay, thence to Ellicott City, 6 miles, and continues beyond between Baltimore and Howard Counties, which is a part of the parking system of Baltimore.

To render the forest available for use as a pleasure ground it must be opened to access. Intersecting alleys should be planned, concentrating, perhaps, at some quiet pool or pretty refuge, and the roads which traverse it should be improved and the system extended to connect by way of the Potomac, the Anacostia, and Rock Creek with the parking system of the District of Columbia, and with that future pantheon of American greatness, the Mall, which will one day rival the most splendid examples of formal landscape design of the Old World.

The undertaking of such a scheme will not only be the glory of our beautiful Capital but it will offer to a dense urban population and to countless transient visitors every form of sylvan pleasure which the inheritance of past ages can suggest from periods when the joy of life and pleasure in beauty went hand in hand.

For these reasons the purchase of a large tract of forest land at a cost of from two to three million dollars by the United States Government is advocated. Had another site been chosen for the Capital, it is likely that the problem of its surroundings would have been entirely different, because the existing conditions are unique, and the suggestion of a forest background might have been chimerical and impracticable. It is this condition which arrests the attention both of the practical man and the artist.

Fortunately, however, for this project, both as to its direct bearing upon the adornment of the Capital and its value in assisting in the promotion of forest cultivation and protection, whether private, State, or National, all the circumstances illustrate the wisdom and even necessity of prompt provision for the need of the people.

Its value for experimental and demonstration purposes can hardly be overestimated. The product of an average acre of such land planted in forest, at a cost of $8, and cared for at an almost negligible annual expense, at the end of a period of 40 years is about $200, which represents a handsome profit from otherwise valueless property.

Large tracts in private hands throughout the Eastern States are available for this purpose only, and their almost universal neglect constitutes at once a great menace through their injurious influence upon climate and water supply and an immense financial loss, while to demonstrate the possibilities of this branch of agricultural industry and science should be a great advantage to the Nation.

If the United States Government desires to regard it simply as an object lesson it may look forward to a handsome revenue without contemplating such extensive cutting as to materially diminish its beauty and attraction.

Nearly all the great forests of Europe pay large profits, and the example of some of our great railroads in reforesting tracts to produce railway ties, telegraph poles, and other timber shows that the time has come when the original forests must be replaced by artificial means. The plan here outlined has been widely approved by societies interested in the public welfare and by the press. For the sake of brevity an editorial of the New York Evening Post, which appeared also in the Nation, is quoted, as follows:

> "Probably the first impulse of nine persons out of ten on reading the proposal that the Government shall create a national forest of 100,000 acres immediately adjacent to Washington City will be to say that it is nonsense. But it is anything but nonsense. * * * That there is a considerable forest area in a primitive state in the region bordering on Washington must strike everyone at all acquainted with that section. * * * If the tract is all Mr. Ellicott thinks it is there is probably no investment of a few million dollars that would be better worth while. To preserve in perpetuity a genuine national forest of 150 square miles in extent within a stone's throw of the National Capital would be an invaluable achievement."

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and also leave to extend as a part of those remarks a little article by Mr. William M. Ellicott on the national park system. The article is not very long.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman further asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the article referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. When the opportunity came to me to introduce in the House a bill identical with the Senate bill before you, I grasped it eagerly because of the pleasure I felt in the chance to have even some slight connection with this program. In my judgment it will, in the course of time, bring more happiness to more thousands of persons than any other matter that we are considering at this session. Longer ago than I like to recollect I was a member of a college class in which one of my fellow students was a modest, retiring, unassertive youth, the son of the president of the college. I doubt if at that time anyone of his 200 fellow students would have picked him out as the man destined to confer a greater boon upon his fellow men than anyone else in the class. He was not spared for long life. The other day the graduates of that institution and many others honored the ninetieth birthday of his father, the foremost private citizen in the Union. Yet sometimes I wonder if all that President Eliot ever did for his fellow men would outweigh the service rendered it by his son, Charles, my classmate, who became the father of the metropolitan park system of Boston and its surroundings. At the time he began his work for this system there were remonstrances at such expenditure of money, like those you may hear nowadays whenever any public progress of the sort is contemplated. We have acquired now in the creation of that system, I see by the report before you, property worth $69,000,000. I do not believe there is a man or woman in the more than a million people making up greater Boston who would to-day express regret at the expenditure of $1 of that money or who would consent to part with 1 acre of that land. If this summer by chance any of you are in Boston, I should deem it a personal kindness if you would hunt me up and let me show you what we think is the chief glory of our community. I should take you through these parks, and I am sure that you would leave them with recollections of a happier day than any of sight-seeing in all your life.

The same thing ought to be done for Washington and on the same scale.

Yesterday I took the people's limousine, the electric car, and rode out to Great Falls, or nearly there, to Glen Echo. It has been my lot to travel more or less about the world and to see most of its capitals, and as I looked out of the window of the car I tried to recollect another with a spot more capable of delight to the senses than the palisades on the river and the groves that adorn its banks.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman ever gone up the river on the other side, on the Virginia side, toward Great Falls?

Mr. LUCE. Only in the people's limousine.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, you go over one of the roughest kind of roads. If the Government should buy that land over there and build a magnificent boulevard, then the constituents of my friend from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] would not have to build that road themselves. There is method in this madness of buying Virginia land and Maryland land, to fix it up for the people of those two States. I have been over that road and it is an awfully rough road.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Texas used 55 or 57 minutes and has 2 or 3 minutes left. I think he could yield the gentleman from Massachusetts one of those minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I have 10 minutes left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has no time remaining.

Mr. BLANTON. There must be some mistake about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts is running. Does he yield?

Mr. LUCE. I have little more to say. After I had left the car yesterday I climbed up to Glen Echo Heights and if any of you have never enjoyed that walk in between the Conduit Road and the River Road through the woods, I advise you to take it. For an hour I walked among the trees and over the fields, and came back with a strengthened conviction that it would be a crime if the Nation neglected the opportunity to acquire a reasonable part of the suburbs of the city for the delight, not of ourselves alone, but of the generations yet to come.

This bill is drawn to put into effect the system under which our Boston parks were developed. The suggestion has been made that the time should be limited. It is now more than 30 years since we began these Boston developments, and we continue them and they will be continued indefinitely, because the community is always growing and there is more and more need for the extension of the facilities for play, recreation, and the pleasures of the open. While I see no great harm in restricting the time, yet it will inevitably be extended through the years as the people become more and more appreciative of these opportunities for health and enjoyment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, while I am not a member of the District Committee, I have heard so much during the last few years about the question of local taxes and the cost of the District government that it seems to me that we are overdoing it. To support the plan repeatedly presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is to ignore the theory of local government under which the Capital was brought to the District of Columbia. Imagine what it would be to have the Capital in any city other than where it is now, with the District set aside for that purpose. Imagine the executive departments and Congress being embarrassed and annoyed by municipal ordinances and municipal regulations. It seems to me that this cry of the people at home objecting to the cost of the local government here is somewhat exaggerated. I come from a part of the country where we pay a great deal of the Federal taxes and I have never heard any complaint on that score.

It is just part of the overhead cost of government. Why, police protection, fire protection, education are necessarily part of the cost in having our National Capital here. I think we would do better to spend our time on matters of greater importance than to be eternally trying to economize in a ridiculous way about the cost of government in the District of Columbia. We must bear in mind that Congress passes on all District municipal activities. The District was purposely set aside as the site for the Capital, so that there should be no municipal or State interference. Of course, it costs money; but really there is no need of all this alarm that is being sounded continually by the gentleman from Texas.

I am not so sure that the arrangement suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan is the right thing to do. It seems to me that the cost of running the District of Columbia ought to be borne in fair proportion by the National Treasury. Now, on this question of parks, I want to congratulate the committee in coming in here with bills for the acquisition of parks. Gentlemen, you can not look at this project with a provincial viewpoint. I had some experience in municipal government in my city. The time to acquire parks is at least 25 or 50 years before you need them. If you permit your city to grow beyond park limits, it is too late. When there is real need of parks and playgrounds you may find yourself in a condition where you can not buy any ground within distance suitable for that purpose when you need them. In my city if the municipal government had looked forward, as they did to Central Park, for other places on the island of Manhattan, we would not have the densely congested tenement districts all over the city. So during my time at the city hall we went out and bought land here and there, waiting for the city to build up, as it naturally will, and then find the parks awaiting the growth. To take the time of Congress in seeking to economize on parks and schools or anything that tends to beautify this city, I say it is just overplaying for the folks at home. For my part, I can assure you there will be no complaint from the taxpayers of my State, and that State pays a great part of the taxes, if we spend the money judiciously to beautify this city and make it the most beautiful capital in the whole world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I believe I have seven minutes remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield that to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my opinion this is a good bill having a proper view to the future and it should pass. Whenever man has attempted to create anything beautiful he has failed except where he has followed the examples of God. His efforts to paint or carve a woman is worth while just in proportion to the accuracy with which he traces the human form; his effort to paint a landscape is a success in proportion to his ability to faithfully reproduce some natural view. Man-made parks with flower beds and close-cut grass and terrace upon terrace leave a sense of labor and fatigue. Around the city of Washington there are many beautiful natural parks, God-made woods and streams, that are rapidly becoming dissipated. Beautiful Rock Creek has diminished in volume of flow one-half within the last 8 or 10 years, due to the destruction of the timber on its headwater slopes. The stream itself is being polluted by sewage leading into it from property not owned by the Government. It is certainly wise and proper for this Congress to take a step forward in matters of constructive legislation for the future of the District. No other city in the United States with 400,000 or 500,000 people, as this city, but has provided for its future beauty in some such way. I think the Congress will make a mistake of putting a time limit, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio. Future Congresses can repeal the bill if necessary, and this amount of money is needed, and the citizens of the District, and of the entire country as well, will get no greater enjoyment from any other source. The remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] are very proper, although they have no special relation to this bill. I also want to take this time to discuss a matter along the same line and equally as inapplicable to this bill. I have been on the District of Columbia Committee for three years, and I will say I have conscientiously worked, and I find that we are gradually falling behind in constructive municipal legislation. Not only in the lack of a comprehensive park system but in many other constructive measures the District is falling behind other cities and States.

We have not in the District of Columbia any adequate insurance code. We have no comprehensive banking system. We have no fraudulent securities law or blue sky law. We have no workman's compensation law. We have no venereal disease bill, and our transportation system is confused, resulting in exorbitant street-car fare, and the reason for it is that Congress has not time to legislate in these matters. Just the other day I was astonished to find that it was necessary for an act of Congress to move the bodies of two children from a cemetery in the District of Columbia over to a cemetery in Maryland where their relatives have been buried. Something has to be done, and we might as well face the situation. Something has to be done toward a legislative system properly functioning for the Government of the United States and also for the District. The Members of Congress can give their serious attention this summer to a proper solution of this problem. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] discussed legislation along the line which would take from Congress the necessity of passing on all of these unimportant and purely local matters and placing them in the legislative control of the District and yet retain in the Congress the power of vetoing any act. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] just suggested, it certainly would be unwise for the District to be in the control of any local government. I call his attention to the fact that the Congress itself was chased through the streets of the city of Philadelphia when it was under local control there. It ought not to be under local control, and yet it ought not to have the exclusive control of all local matters. The result of this situation——

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. I will.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the gentleman think there would be any danger of a similar proceeding at the present time if Congress were located in some sections under local control?

Mr. GILBERT. Well, it could be harassed considerably by ordinances and local restraint. It ought to have the privilege of exclusive control and yet not be annoyed by having to consider every little act of detail that might come up in city government as it is now.

I took this time just to make these few observations for the benefit of the record and the consideration of Members of Congress during the summer because we might as well face the fact that something has to be done here in the District, and neither my remarks on this subject nor the remarks of the gentleman from Texas on insufficient taxation can be considered as having special applicability to this bill. This bill ought to pass——

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. I will.

Mr. TILSON. As I understand, the gentleman favors the Government retaining absolute control over the District in which it is established?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes. Madison, in his comments on that matter before the Constitutional Convention of 1787, used the thought that it would be unwise for the Government of the United States to be under the control or subject to the limitations of local jurisdictions.

Mr. TILSON. I think he was entirely sound in that, and we ought never to permit ourselves to deviate from it.

Mr. GILBERT. And certainly 110,000,000 people ought to be able to have a home somewhere, and at the same time an act of Congress ought not to be required for every executive or administrative function as, for instance, to remove a body, like we had before us the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to preserve the flow of water in Rock Creek, to prevent pollution of Rock Creek and the Potomac and Anacostia Rivers, to preserve forests and natural scenery in and about Washington, and to provide for the comprehensive, systematic, and continuous development of the park, parkway, and playground system of the National Capital, there is hereby constituted a commission, to be known as the national capital park commission, composed of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, the Engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, the Director of the National Park Service, the Chief of the Forest Service, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, and the chairmen of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and House of Representatives. At the close of each Congress the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall appoint, respectively, a Senator elect and a Representative elect to the succeeding Congress to serve as members of this commission until the chairmen of committees of the succeeding Congress shall be chosen. The officer in charge of public buildings and grounds shall be the executive and disbursing officer of said commission.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEGG: Page 2, line 3, after the word "on," strike out the words "Public Buildings and Grounds" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the District of Columbia."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, all there is to that is to make the chairmen of the Committees on the District of Columbia of the Senate and House of Representatives members of this commission instead of the chairmen of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds. I believe the District of Columbia Committee is the proper committee to be represented on this commission, as that committee knows more about the affairs of the District than any other committee, not even excepting the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That is the only purpose I have in offering the amendment.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. I observe that this bill itself has been reported to the House by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I am a little surprised that they were so generous——

Mr. UNDERHILL. So modest.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman from Massachusetts suggests modest. I was not prepared to use that exact word in this connection; but I will be glad to accept his suggestion and to say that I am a little surprised they were so modest and so generous as to provide for the membership upon this commission of chairmen of committees other than their own.

In this connection, and along the line of the testimonials which have been made by representatives of other large communities of the country, I want to say, coming from the second largest city in the Union, that I am very much pleased that we have embarked upon this plan of providing further park space and recreation space for the people of the District of Columbia. In Chicago we not only have, as everybody knows, a large number of very spacious parks which have been established within the city, but outside of the city we have established a forest preserve which contains lands at this time amounting to 34,000 acres, which are devoted to recreation grounds for the public. It is a movement which ought to be encouraged throughout the entire country.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, a while ago some gentleman made a remark in reference to this bill which seemed to be based on the assumption that the plan which it embodies is instigated by the States lying nearest to the District—the State of Maryland and the State of Virginia. This is a complete misapprehension, so far as my own State is concerned. The State of Virginia has had nothing to do with the origination of this proposed legislation. I personally have had nothing to do with it. While, of course, living as near as I do to the city of Washington, I perhaps know more about conditions surrounding the District than some of the other Members, I can view the subject in an impartial and unprejudiced way if I am capable of taking that attitude in respect to any subject.

It strikes me that gentlemen should have no difficulty in concluding, from what has been stated in general terms here, that the people of the entire country are interested in the Capital City; that they should have no difficulty in believing that whatever we can fairly do should be done to make the Capital City still more attractive and beautiful than it is now. And it can hardly be doubted by anyone that the outlying country in proximity to the city should receive the attention of Congress, so that the city itself may not suffer from any failure to look after the situation in Maryland and Virginia so far as it is closely related to the matter of the future of Washington. Reference has been made to the shores of the Potomac. The State of New York has taken steps to safeguard, by park extension, the beautiful palisades of the Hudson.

Here is one of the most notable rivers of the world. Those who have not traversed it from its source in the mountains to its mouth at Chesapeake Bay hardly know how noble and picturesque is the Potomac as it winds its way from West Virginia down to Point Lookout. Is it thinkable that Congress should not concern itself to protect the palisades of the Potomac, and I am mentioning only one of the matters which is had in mind by the friends of this bill? That is inconceivable, and yet the palisades are being defaced and broken down by blasting processes that have been going on for several years, and that will continue unless there is Government intervention.

I do not know of any sentiment in Virginia that favors the passage of this bill, except the same patriotic sentiment which all other States share with Virginia. I do not know of a solitary landowner in Virginia who has suggested that he will be benefited by it, and I wish to repel the suggestion, so often made here, that when the gentleman representing a Maryland district [Mr. ZIHLMAN] and I, representing a Virginia district, participate in the enactment of legislation relative to the District of Columbia that in some manner involves Maryland and Virginia that we are actuated by selfish motives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I ask permission to speak out of order? I did not get an opportunity to proceed in general debate, and this is a matter of great importance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. For how long?

Mr. McKEOWN. I would like to ask for consent to proceed 10 minutes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will have to object to the gentleman having 10 minutes. We would like to finish this bill, and I hope the gentleman will not insist on having 10 minutes. I would not object to his having 5 minutes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I can not proceed with this matter in five minutes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It is now 5 o'clock, and we have a number of sections to read. I hope the gentleman will let us finish the bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. I hope the gentleman will be patient with me.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Suppose the gentleman renews his request a little later or asks for five minutes.

Mr. McKEOWN. It is on a very important matter.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would not object later on when we get a little further along with the bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. Then I will ask for permission to speak out of order for five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes out of order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I desire to call the attention of the Congress to the invasion or threatened invasion of the power of the Executive by the judiciary of this country.

Very recently two judges of the United States court have held that the President of the United States does not have the right to pardon or to issue pardons in contempt cases. I want to call the attention of the Congress to the fact that in the very earliest history of our Government it was conceded that the President of the United States had such power; in fact, the power in the President to grant pardons and paroles is contained in that section of the Constitution which gives him the greatest power of all, and that is the power to be a dictator in time of war. In that very section is contained the power, "and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment."

There is only one exception. It is contended that in contempt cases it is not a criminal proceeding, and for that reason the President of the United States can not grant pardons or reprieves. Let me show you where this will lead. If that remains the law it will be so that every newspaper editor in America will be in danger of being imprisoned. Free speech and free press will depart from a free country.

I call your attention to a decision in the very early history of our country by a Federal judge in the State of New York in which he held that—> where a fine was imposed upon a person by this court as a punishment for contempt of this court committed by violating an injunction issued by the court, and it is ordered he shall stand committed until the fine shall be paid, and he applied to this court for discharge from imprisonment on the ground he was unable to pay the fine, held that this court would not exercise the power invoked, at least until the President should disclaim the power to relieve the applicant by a pardon. Contempt of this court is an offense against the United States. An adjudication by the court that the contempt has been committed is a conviction, and a commitment thereon is execution.

In face of that decision they perhaps rely upon the famous Debs decision in which it was held that in civil cases a contempt was not a criminal offense; but, gentlemen, the press of this country will be alarmed, the people of this country will be alarmed when they know they are now threatening to invade the power of the Executive.

Every one of the Attorneys General prior to 1860—and I have found no decisions to the contrary since—held that contempt of court was a case in which the President could exercise the power of pardon. The act of two Federal judges in the early history of this Nation brought about congressional action. After Kentucky was admitted into the Union as a State, it passed a law against imprisonment for debt and the Federal courts in Kentucky, having no Federal statute under which execution could issue, proceeded under rules of their own making to imprison judgment debtors in Kentucky. This brought about the most violent excoriation upon these judges by the Congress. Now we behold a more serious invasion of the Executive's rights and the arbitrary setting aside of the Constitution. I hope the new and able Attorney General will resist to the utmost this invasion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will not the gentleman let me conclude?

Mr. BEGG. Will not the gentleman extend his remarks? It is 5 o'clock, and let us finish the bill. I can see no reason why the gentleman should not extend his remarks and let us go on with the bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. I have been very patient and I have not imposed on this House and I think everybody knows that I have not imposed on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I accept the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That there is authorized to be appropriated, each year hereafter, in the annual District of Columbia appropriation act, a sum not exceeding 1 cent for each inhabitant of the continental United States as determined by the last preceding decennial census, to be available until used, said sum to be used by said commission for the acquisition of the lands herein authorized to be acquired by said commission for the purposes named, the compensation for the land, the expense of surveys, ascertainment of title, condemnation proceedings, if any, and necessary conveyancing to be paid from said appropriations. That three-fourths of all the funds so appropriated shall be used by said commission for the acquisition of lands within the District of Columbia and the funds so used to acquire property within the District shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and the general funds of the Treasury in the same proportion as other expenses of the District of Columbia. The land so acquired within the District of Columbia shall be a part of the park system of the District of Columbia and be under control of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army; that areas suitable for playground purposes may, in the discretion of said commission, be assigned to the control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for playground purposes. That the land so acquired outside the District of Columbia shall be controlled as determined by agreement between said commission and the proper officers of the States of Maryland and Virginia, such agreements to be subject to the approval of the President.

Mr. GIBSON and Mr. BLANTON rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont, in charge of the bill, is entitled to preferential recognition.

Mr. GIBSON. The chairman of the committee, before he assumed the chair, had some amendments which I am very glad to offer in my own name, and I am sure they will be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr GIBSON: Page 3, line 23, after the word "census" strike out "to be available until used."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont has a series of amendments.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have been here eight years——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont is in charge of the bill. The gentleman from Vermont offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum, if we are not going to have the usual rules followed here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is not a quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his point of order, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GIBSON: Page 3, line 24, after the word "commission," insert "for the payment of its expenses and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 4, after the word "appropriation," strike out all to and including the word "Columbia" in line 7.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SNYDER). The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. GIBSON: Page 4, line 9, after the word "Columbia," strike out the balance of line 9 and all of line 10.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if my amendment is adopted these funds hereafter will be appropriated wholly out of the funds of the District of Columbia for additional parks and playground purposes. I do not see why we should continue to appropriate for these purposes out of the Federal Treasury. Under the bill we appropriate one-quarter of the whole sum out of the Treasury, and the remaining three-quarters come out of the District and Government 60–40. I think that is a bad practice.

The only reason I mentioned the land in Virginia is that the bill authorizes it. I meant no reflection on our good friend from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], but here in his district all along the Potomac River on the other side. All of these funds we have been spending there inure to the benefit of his people. When we built the several million dollar Key Bridge his people did not have to spend a cent for it, but they use it every day. If we buy the parkway from here to Great Falls on the Virginia side and supplement that by a road with a fine boulevard, his people will get the benefit of it. If we appropriate $44,000,000 to build the dams at Great Falls and all that fine reservoir and park system, his people will enjoy it. He can not get around it. It is no reflection on him, it is advertising him and his ability in getting that out of the Federal Treasury.

The next park bill is to appropriate $762,000 out of the Treasury. I am not reflecting on the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN]. I am advertising him as being able to get this money out of the Federal Treasury. This House bill was introduced by him. If we spend $44,000,000 out at Great Falls, his people living in Maryland will get the benefit of it. This amendment of mine ought to pass. We ought to stop taking this money out of the Federal Treasury. We have spent enough money here already.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The two amendments of the gentleman from Vermont has offered, one pending and the other not before the House, do this. They provide that all the expenditures under this bill shall be borne as other expenses of the District.

Mr. BLANTON. That is 60–40.

Mr. CRAMTON. At present that is 60–40, as the bill provides three-quarters come in that way and one-quarter exclusively from the Treasury. The amendment the gentleman has offered does away with that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I had this in mind. In view of the fact that we have spent $490,000 to buy playgrounds out on Sixteenth Street, wholly out of the Treasury, and the District did not contribute to it at all, and we have spent 100 per cent out of the Treasury to buy several park grounds, I thought it was only fair that additional park places should be paid for wholly out of the District appropriation. But if my colleagues do not agree to it, I can not help it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will vote down the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas. I think I speak for the entire committee when I say that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, which provides that these expenses for park purposes shall be borne 60 per cent by the District and 40 per cent by the Federal Government, is entirely satisfactory to the committee. We should not attempt in this legislation to change the fiscal relationship and policy existing between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government. That is entirely another proposition and should be met upon its merits at some other time. It has no place on this bill, and I hope the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas will be voted down.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I think the way in which my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] presents his views is a little ungenerous. The gentleman, if he will stop to consider a moment, will, of course, realize that many improvements of advantage to the city of Washington, and which are necessary, as, for instance, the construction of bridges across the Potomac, are, of course, at the same time advantageous to the State of Virginia, without regard to what we Virginians may say or do. I am frequently surprised to hear my friend speak so ungenerously on this subject. I think he might now and then reflect upon what the State of Virginia has done for his own State. From my country across the Potomac and from other sections of Virginia young men went out to participate in the war with Mexico, the result of which meant so much to Texas. It happens that a kinsman whose name I bear was one of them. He and many others gave their lives in battle against those who questioned the right of Texas to be free. After a while a Virginia President signed the resolution which authorized the annexation of Texas to the Union, and placed the star of Texas on the flag along with the stars of the older States. Before that a Virginia President had insisted upon the application of the Monroe doctrine with respect to Texas when two of the great powers of Europe were greedily asserting their right to establish colonies in Texas. But why elaborate the history of the past with which he is so familiar? I hope hereafter that my friend will be more considerate. I hope he will bear in mind the fact that while I have introduced several bills, some of which are now pending before his committee, I have not been conspicuously successful in securing their enactment, and should receive his support of at least some of them, which, while they will be beneficial to my State, will be primarily and equally beneficial to the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GIBSON: Page 4, line 7, after the word "and," strike out "the funds so used to acquire property within the District" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the funds so appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 3, line 20, strike out all of lines 20, 21, 22, and that part of line 23 including the word "census," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "not exceeding $600,000 for the next fiscal year of 1925."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides every year interminably for an appropriation of $1,100,000. My amendment is to authorize an appropriation for the coming fiscal year of $600,000, and then let the Congress furnish what it desires hereafter. I am not in favor of $1,100,000 every year for all time to come.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 21, after the word "act," strike out the rest of line 21 and lines 22 and 23 to the comma after the word "census" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000,000."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me rather an awkward way to authorize an appropriation to say that we are going to appropriate 1 cent per person in the United States annually. That is approximately $1,100,000. Let us just authorize $1,000,000 and say what it is and not say a certain number of inhabitants.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ZIHLMAN) there were—ayes 10, noes 22.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If this amendment be adopted, we may as well reject the entire bill. What purpose does it serve to make large plans for the future and then provide that before you can do anything under them you must go back every year and get an authorization from Congress? It absolutely kills the usefulness of the bill, especially when we realize what difficulties the District Committee has in getting legislation through, even the simplest legislation.

It seems to me that unless we wish to discard this whole legislation, which seems to me to be useful and constructive, we ought to vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman think it is a wise proposition at this time, in view of the statement of the President asking Congress to remain within reasonable bounds in the matter of appropriations? Would the gentleman vote to pass this bill and then have some fellow go out in his district and say that he voted to authorize an appropriation of $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 or $20,000,000?

Mr. TILSON. I think that it is very important to preserve the places around Washington which are so well fitted for a parking system, in fact, far more important than even that the gentleman from Oklahoma or myself be elected at the coming election. It seems to me that the election should cut no figure here whatsoever. This bill is carefully safeguarded, and, after all, Congress must make the appropriation year after year, which is proper. The authorization for a plan of this sort, however, should be made so that we can make the appropriations year after year if we see fit without having to come to Congress year after year for a new authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEGG. I have another amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEGG: Page 3, line 20, after the word "hereafter," insert "for 10 succeeding years."

Mr. BEGG. Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word on this amendment. In the first place, I think it is ridiculous to authorize here an appropriation of a cent a person. It is too big a joke and ridiculous for me to be serious about it, to try to put over on the American people that you are assessing for park purposes in the District of Columbia a cent a person. That has nothing to do with this amendment. The other is a burlesque. This amendment limits the time that this bill applies to a change in the census. Now, 10 years is a long time to appropriate an indefinite sum of money.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I will.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Does not the gentleman imagine that the owners of these worthless hills around about here will be chagrined at the knowledge of not being able to get more than $10,000,000 for them?

Mr. BEGG. If the gentleman is asking a serious question I will be glad to answer it. I believe in park purposes, but I also believe in a definite policy, and I also believe in having the courage to come out and say what we are going to authorize, and I think we ought to say for how long. Under the bill as it is to-day we are legislating for the next 500 years. If we put in an amendment limiting it to the next 10 years, certainly there will be a Congress in session with enough intelligence to know whether it will continue to keep on appropriating or not.

Mr. UNDERHILL. In almost every large city where they are undertaking this development it has taken anywhere from 18 to 20 years to carry it out, and I think if the gentleman will refer to the history of the park development of his own city of Cleveland, Ohio, he will find it extended over a period of 22 years. In Boston it extended over a period of 20 years, and you are not going to have some scientific plan if you are only going to extend this over a period of 10 years, that is not sufficient time, but if you will make it a reasonable amount, say 20 years, then you can have a plan of some scientific value and carry out the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BEGG. Well, I am not satisfied——

Mr. UNDERHILL. I move to amend by inserting 20 years.

Mr. BEGG. I will accept the amendment as far as that is concerned. I think we ought to put in something definite, 10 or 20, but the gentleman's amendment is agreeable to me. I have no desire to hurt the bill, but it seems to me that we ought to present a bill in some sort of condition that we will not be ridiculed for what we are turning out. I will accept the amendment of 20 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the nemndment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the amendment is so modified.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment as amended. Gentlemen, I think you are making a mistake. Of course, you can do as you want to do. You are going to put in this bill a million dollars for 10 years, which will make $10,000,000. Every message from the President has been asking the Congress to economize. Now you go out here and put in $10,000,000, or rather authorize such an appropriation. There are people in this country whose businesses are closing up; hard times are stalking in the street. And then it goes out in every direction that the Congress of the Nation is putting in its time appropriating $10,000,000, of which $5,000,000 is to be paid by the taxpayers. And for what? For playgrounds for the people of Washington! Now, do you want that to go out to the country; do you want the information to go out to the country and let all the people know that you do not propose to economize, although you are called upon to do so by the President?

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Is the gentleman in favor of the bill without the amendment?

Mr. McKEOWN. No, sir. I am in favor of the bill if you limit the amount to start with. The Treasury is not in any condition at this time to be making authorizations for large sums of money.

Mr. BEGG. That is what I am trying to do—limit it.

Mr. McKEOWN. The difference between the gentleman's amendment and the bill is that the gentleman is in the open with his amendment and states what he wants to do, while this bill is under a cloud. It says 1 cent on each one of the inhabitants of the United States, and I will not vote for any bill that would put even a cent on my people.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we lose sight of the fact that a great mass of the legislation in this House puts no limitation on amounts to be appropriated. I call the attention of the members of this committee to the fact that one of the great criticisms has been the laxity of Congress in passing appropriate legislation which will legally permit including in appropriation bills amounts for things which the people and Congress desire to provide for and which if a single Member objects must be stricken out of appropriation bills on a point of order, although 434 other Members of Congress approve the item. I recall that the present chairman of this committee by a point of order had stricken out the appropriation for the aerial mail.

I believe it would be just as wise, when we have determined on a proper policy for the District of Columbia, the Capital of the country, to put no limitation in the bill. We are not appropriating any money, but we are putting it within the power and judgment of succeeding Congresses to appropriate the amount which would be thought wise in the judgment of those who come after us and in keeping with the condition of the Treasury from time to time and the needs and the opportunities of the people in extending the growth of this National Capital.

I do not object to the bill in the shape it is now in, but I do object to putting further restrictions upon it, which will show that we are less farsighted than George Washington, who secured the help of Major l'Enfant and planned this glorious Capital. His vision of the destiny of this mighty Republic was real prophecy. We find that we have been shortsighted in our neglect to carry out the original plan. We have blocked the extension of our great avenues and streets. The plans of the Father of his Country have been warped, marred, and crippled. We ought to have a plan for this city and ought to pass legislation now which shows a confidence in our country in future and a general policy looking toward the development of this Capital. This development will be carried out by appropriate appropriations in keeping with the judgment of those Congresses which come after us. We may wisely be satisfied with the limitation provided in the bill, because it is a limitation not carried in many bills which are passed without any criticism.

Let us not seek to tie the hands of future Congresses and create obstacles by limitations in legislative enactments which, while authorizing future appropriations, may, because of our limited vision, dwarf the normal growth in beauty and usefulness of the Capital of the greatest nations. I hope that this amendment will be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRAMTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 112) providing for a comprehensive development of the park and playground system of the National Capital, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McKEOWN) there were—ayes 37, noes 0.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit, and may I make a parliamentary inquiry? The previous question having been ordered, if the House should adjourn before we take the final vote on the motion to recommit, then the bill would come up the first thing in the morning?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith amended as follows: "On page 3, line 20, after the word 'hereafter,' insert 'for five years,' and in line 21, after the word 'exceeding,' strike out the balance of line 21 and all of line 22 and line 23 down to and including the word 'census' and insert in lieu thereof '$1,000,000.'"

POSTAL SALARY BILL

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the postal bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave given me to extend my remarks, I desire to present some information regarding the pending postal salary bill (H. R. 9035) and to make some observations on the question of parcel post and other postage rates, although there is nothing incorporated in the bill which will be presented to the House for action within a few days contemplating an adjustment of rates on any class of mail matter.

In the present Congress a large number of bills have been introduced proposing increases in salaries of postal employees. At least one of these bills contains a provision for raising the revenue to meet the increased cost in salaries by increasing the postage rates on parcel post. A number of bills have also been introduced proposing changes in postage rates on the different classes of mail matter.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has very carefully studied all these measures, and in reporting to the House this increased salary bill—H. R. 9035—points out as its conclusion that a revenue-producing measure should not be presented for the consideration of Congress at this time. The question of a proper postage rate is one which can be determined only upon information which it is peculiarly within the province of the Post Office Department to ascertain and furnish to Congress. No commission or committee or any other body without the cooperation of the department could possibly make a survey of the Postal Service and an ascertainment of the cost of transportation and handling and the revenues from the several classes of mail.

The question of a proper compensation for the services of postal employees is another question, information concerning which, based on living costs, working conditions, wages, and salaries in other occupations and industries or activities is readily available to Congress from other sources. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, before whom appeared nearly 300 Members of the House and Senate who testified at great length as to the needs of the service for more adequate salaries and better working conditions, also received information from more than 50 representatives of the groups or organizations of these employees, as well as official information on the subject from the Civil Service Commission, the Department of Labor, and others, and also thousands of letters and petitions from patrons of the service, urging Congress to increase the salaries of the postal employees—to which they are entitled.

Adverting again to the question of increasing postage rates, in a letter to the committee under date of February 29, 1924, the Postmaster General said:

> There never was an ascertainment of the cost of carrying and handling the several classes of mail matter and performing the special services, excepting once, in the history of the department. In 1907 Congress authorized certain weighings and counts of mails for such purpose and the department concluded an estimate in 1909. That estimate was thereafter reviewed by the Hughes Commission in 1911–12. The findings made at that time are inapplicable to the conditions of service to-day, which conditions have changed materially in many respects. Realizing the importance of an ascertainment brought up to date in dealing with all postal questions, the Congress wisely, through the efforts of the Joint Postal Commission and later by an appropriation of $500,000 to be expended by the Postmaster General, authorized such an ascertainment. The department made comprehensive and elaborate preparation for securing the data, which data is now in hand and being checked, arranged, and tabulated for the purpose of use in the final ascertainment. The undertaking is a large one, involving a vast amount of work, and the results are not yet available. It is believed, however, that they will be ready within a few months.
> No readjustment of postage rates or fees for special services can be made intelligently until this ascertainment has been made.

There are four classes of mail. The first class includes letters, post cards, and sealed matter which yields a profit; the second class includes newspapers and periodicals. That the revenue from this class of mail does not cover the cost of transportation and handling is generally accepted. Whether or not the rates should be increased or decreased, can not be readily determined. Upon the completion of the ascertainment of cost referred to by the Postmaster General, Congress will be able to act. The third class consists of miscellaneous printed matter, circulars, and so forth. The revenue from this class of mail is very small, comparatively, and even if the rates were doubled the additional revenue derived would be inconsiderable. The fourth class, which is parcel post, has been in operation but a few years. Its growth has been tremendous, until to-day practically all small freights and express matter are carried in the mails as parcel post.

The act of Congress establishing the parcel-post system (37 Stat. L. 558) provides as follows:

> The classification of articles mailable as well as the weight limit, the rates of postage, zone or zones, and other conditions of mailability under this act, if the Postmaster General shall find on experience that they or any of them are such as to prevent the shipment of articles desirable, or to permanently render the cost of the service greater than the receipts or the revenue therefrom, he is hereby authorized, subject to the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission after investigation, to reform from time to time such classification, weight limit, rates, zone or zones, or conditions, or either, in order to promote the service to the public or to insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof.

Under this provision the Postmaster General has the authority, among other things, to change the rates of postage to insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof, subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It requires no act of Congress to make the adjustment. The determination as to what the rates should be rests upon the conditions as the Postmaster General shall find them by investigation from time to time, and it is no answer to the demand for an increased wage to the employees, that the consideration of their bill should be postponed pending an ascertainment of the facts necessary to an adjustment of postage rates.

And further, I wish to again point out that the Postal Service is a growing business. The normal growth, based on the experiences of the past, is sufficient to absorb a very large amount of the increase asked for by the postal employees in a twelvemonth in actual revenue. What the benefits might be in the way of increased efficiency and improvement in the morale of the personnel can not be overestimated.

PARK AND PLAYGROUND SYSTEM OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division, and, pending that, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that to allow certain routine business?

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold it for that purpose, Mr. Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. WINTER, for two days, on account of very important business.

To Mr. CASEY, for two weeks, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. MCSWAIN, for four days, from May 28 to May 31, on account of important business.

MEMORIAL DAY, 1924

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and in extending my remarks to include the speech by our colleague, Mr. WILSON of Mississippi, made at the decoration of Confederate graves yesterday afternoon, and to include newspaper quotations from President Coolidge's very kindly and wholesome address on the same occasion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that we set aside a day to celebrate the services of our heroic dead and to pay loving tribute to their memory. This ought to be a time when thoughts indulged and things said should bind all our people into a closer brotherhood and tender the hearts of true Americans toward all humanity. God forbid that we should make this sacred occasion an opportunity for stirring up prejudice and hatred.

Three years ago, at this season, I had the honor to deliver the address on Confederate Memorial Day at Arlington. I spoke, not in a controversial tone, on the life and character of Jefferson Davis, the first and only President of the Confederacy, one of the greatest and one of the most misunderstood of all Americans. I believe the most appreciated compliment I received on that speech was from Mr. Osborne, of California, then the only old Union soldier in the House. He said that in "the tragic war of the sixties" he had fought for an unbroken and indissoluble Union, and that he now wanted to see it a real union of the hearts of the people. And he very kindly added that the content and tone of my speech would help to that end. Since that time the loved and honored Henry Z. Osborne has gone to his reward. May his benevolent spirit brood over the country he loved.

At this same season three years ago the now lamented Warren G. Harding said:

> There is no longer a sign of conflict. We are united in the sweetest concord that ever united men.

And Secretary Denby, in a great speech made down South, said:

> I am a northerner, but first I am an American. You can not take from me my pride in Lee and Jackson and Pickett, and your own immortal Forrest.

This is as it should be. Surely we have gotten far enough from the bitter days of the Civil War to honor every brave soldier, whether he wore the blue or the gray, and to admire every feat of valor on either side, rejoicing in it as American valor.

On the afternoon of the 25th of this month many of the good people of Washington again gathered in sacred Arlington to decorate the Confederate graves and attend the reunion of that thin line of aged and heroic men in gray. My brilliant young colleague, T. WEBBER WILSON, of Mississippi, delivered an able and inspiring address and our honored President, Calvin Coolidge, though a New Englander, spoke kind and candid words, which the people of the South will hear with deep appreciation.

Under permission to extend my remarks, I have the honor to place quotations from both these addresses in the RECORD:

MR. WILSON'S ADDRESS

Every day is Memorial Day in the heart of every loyal son and daughter of the South. But we come again on this Sabbath day to this historic spot to remember again those brave men who in 1861 followed the Stars and Bars.

The South did not fight, as some people mistakenly believe, to keep the negro in bondage, but we fought for as holy a principle as ever engaged the hearts of men. We fought in order that the world might know and understand that every State in this American Union was a sovereign State and as such it had a right to work out its own destiny. Some people have referred to the cause for which the South fought as the "lost cause." I resent such a statement with every fiber of my being. No cause that was just was ever lost. I remember what Woodrow Wilson once said:

> "I had rather fail in a cause that will ultimately triumph than to triumph in a cause that will ultimately fail."

The South did not fight for a lost cause, because the very principle for which they offered up their lives and fortunes has been enshrined in the hearts of men.

PROUD OF DAVIS

I am proud of the fact that my State, the great Commonwealth of Mississippi, had the honor to give to the Confederate States of America their first, last, and only President. A truer type of southern manhood never lived than Jefferson Davis, the man who was indeed a martyr to a sacred cause. We regard him as one of the greatest citizens whose names enrich and adorn the annals of Mississippi. It is with deep regret that I have heard some of his own countrymen question the motives that moved and directed his great life. Many of our people have seen fit to criticize this good man—many times have the shafts of criticism been directed at him—but when the mists of prejudice have finally been wafted away upon the winds of reason we will behold the same great and noble man, Jefferson Davis, standing serene and unharmed. A great Mississippian said of him—and I believe it with all my heart—"E'er another century has rolled by no intelligent voice can fail to praise him and no patriotic hand will refuse to place a laurel wreath upon his radiant brow."

THEIR MEMORY SACRED

I hope the day will never come when we will cease to honor the memory of Jefferson Davis and all those who followed him and his leadership in the dark days between 1861 and 1865. Would that I possessed the mystic power to wipe from your minds all recollections of that awful struggle that drenched our beloved land with the blood of our brethren, but had I that power I would not erase from your minds the memory of those brave and courageous men who spilled their blood in order that the principles near and dear to every southerner's heart might not perish from the earth.

I wish that I possessed the gift of eulogy in order that I might pay just tribute to their memory. I feel almost persuaded to break Emerson's law of self-reliance and call to the matchless pen of some Shakespeare or the silver tongue of some Prentiss to proclaim their services to their country; but even if I were possessed of the gift of eulogy the bravery, fortitude, and courage of these immortal souls need no eulogy. Long after they have all crossed over the river where rest Lee and Jackson and their comrades under the shade of the trees; long after the marble shafts that mark their resting place have crumbled back to dust, their memory will be green and fresh within the heart of every true American. Their matchless acts and deeds of heroism are truly the everlasting monuments of their blessed memory.

THE GREATEST SOLDIERS

Some historians have said that the greatest soldiers the world ever saw were those who stood upon the banks of the Marne River in the recent world upheaval and barred the gateway of a Christian civilization against the onrushing hordes of Germany, but I desire to avail myself of this opportunity to say that the world never saw a braver or more courageous body of men than those who fought beneath my Southland's flag from 1861 to 1865. Their deeds of valor made glorious many a battle field and their devotion to a great principle will quicken the heartbeat of generations yet unborn when they are privileged to read the pages of impartinl history.

A truer, more perfect type of manhood can not be found in all of the periods of the world's history than that which followed Lee and Jackson and the other southern chieftains, and who when the bloody conflict was at an end came home and drained the fields that were running red with the blood of their countrymen, rebuilt their desolated places, and set about the work of man.

HATE AND ILL WILL GONE

And I thank God that in the rebuilding of our devastated places we did not use one particle of the mortar of hate nor a single brick of ill will. Every true southerner to-day thanks God that we have a united country, and that the Mason-Dixon line is not any more a yawning chasm of death and destruction, but it is merely a red scar of honor across the heart of this Republic, binding us together forever with unbreakable ties of friendship and of love. To use the words of Benjamin Hill, "There was a South of slavery and secession. That South is dead. There is a South of union and freedom. That South, thank God, is living, breathing, and growing every hour."

And I know if the Confederate soldiers, both living and dead, could speak to us on this occasion that they would say to us that the most acceptable service we can render upon this occasion is to extol the glories of a common country. Of course, I love my Dixieland better than any other section of God's green earth, but I am proudest of the fact that I can stand this day tiptoe upon the horizon of civilization and declare to all mankind that I am an American citizen.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH

If I am correctly informed by history it is fitting that the Sabbath should be your Memorial Day. This follows from the belief that, except for the forces of Oliver Cromwell, no army was ever more thoroughly religious than that which was commanded by General Lee.

Moreover, these ceremonies necessarily are expressive of a hope and a belief that rise above the things of this life. It was Lincoln who pointed out that both sides prayed to the same God.

When that is the case, it is only a matter of time when each will seek a common end.

We can now see clearly what that end is.

It is the maintenance of our American form of government, of our American institutions, and of our American ideals, beneath a common flag, under the blessings of Almighty God.

It was for this purpose that this Nation was brought forth. Our whole course of history has been proceeding in that direction. Out of a common experience, made more enduring by a common sacrifice, we have reached a common conclusion.

On this day we pause in memory of those who made their sacrifice in one way. In a few days we shall pause again in memory of those who made their sacrifice in another way. They were all Americans, all contending for what they believed were their rights.

On many a battle field they sleep side by side. Here, in a place which is set aside for the resting place of those who have performed military duty, both make their final bivouac. But their country lives.

The bitterness of conflict is passed. Time has softened, discretion has changed it.

Your country respects you for cherishing the memory of those who wore the gray. You respect others who cherish the memory of those who wore the blue. In the mutual respect may there be a firmer friendship and a stronger and more glorious Union.

When I delivered the address dedicating the great monument to General Grant in the city of Washington, General Carr was present with others of his comrades, and responded for the Confederacy with a most appropriate tribute. He has lately passed away, one of the last of a talented and gallant corps of officers.

To the memory of him whom I had seen and heard and knew as the representative of that now silent throng, whom I did not know, I now offer my tribute. We know that it is Providence that would have it so. We see and we obey.

A mightier force than ever followed Grant or Lee has leveled their hosts, raised up an united Nation, and made us all partakers of a new glory. It is not for us to forget the past, but to remember it, that we may profit by it.

But it is gone, we can not change it. We must put our emphasis on the present and put into effect the lessons the past has taught us.

All about us sleep those of many different beliefs and many divergent actions. But America claims them all. Her flag floats over them. Her Government protects them. They all rest in the same divine peace.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN LANDS AT CAMP JACKSON, S. C.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House bill 490.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, permission having been given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD in connection with the passage of H. R. 490 as an amendment to H. R. 9124, I would like to say: In the summer of 1917 a number of citizens of Columbia subscribed to a fund for the purchase of a tract of land containing 1,192 acres near the city of Columbia, S. C., and gave same to the Government of the United States as a camp site. Upon this site Camp Jackson was located, and thereafter the United States Government acquired additional lands to the extent of 20,000 acres in round numbers. This tract of land was conveyed to the United States Government on the 16th day of November, 1917, by J. Edwin Belser, as trustee, in behalf of the subscribers to the fund through which the 1,192 acres had been purchased, and the deed was accepted by the United States Government and was duly recorded in the office of the registrar of deeds, Richland County, S. C.

The heart of the camp was located upon the 1,192 acres. Street-car tracks, railroad tracks, and concrete streets and roads were built across it. On January 10, 1922, a subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee, in making its report to the Committee on Military Affairs regarding lands owned by the Government and under the control of the War Department, recommended that all lands that had been given to the Government for war purposes by a State, municipality, society, or individual, on which no valuable improvements had been constructed by the Government, that a conveyance back to the State, municipality, society, or individual could very properly be made without pecuniary consideration.

However, it was impossible to reconvey this tract of land to the original subscribers who numbered about 150—according to testimony given to the committee by Mr. Frank Pierson, secretary Columbia Chamber of Commerce—as some of them were of a corporation which has been dissolved, and in other instances subscribers to this fund have since died, and so forth. Therefore, in order to accomplish a desirable and practical proposition, the original subscribers, either in person or by their heirs of law or personal representatives, have signed a formal written instrument confirming, requesting, and directing that the United States Government reconvey the said 1,192 acres of land as set forth in the bill H. R. 490.

Desiring to hold on to the original camp site and other adjacent lands for future use of the Federal Government, the Secretary of War consented to reconvey to this board of trustees certain other two tracts of land containing 1,192 acres in lieu of the original 1,192 acres as designated in said bill. A list of those subscribing to said fund and who are now requesting the conveyance of said lands to these certain trustees is as follows:

Now, therefore, we, the subscribers to the said fund and citizens of the city of Columbia, S. C., hereby express our desire to cooperate to the end aforesaid and our hearty approval of the said effort and purposes of the said Chamber of Commerce of the City of Columbia; and we hereby consent to such reconveyance of such land and buildings, or any part thereof, as the chamber of commerce shall request and the said United States Government be pleased to make, and, upon and in event of such reconveyance, we jointly and severally covenant to, and do hereby, release and relinquish unto the grantee thereof, his or its successors, heirs, and assigns, any and all right, title, interest, or estate, present or future, which we, or any of us, have, or may be or become entitled to, of and to the said tract of land and the appurtenances thereto belonging.

Witness our hands and seals, this 31st day of May, 1922.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting resolutions adopted by the Silver Spring Post of the American Legion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain resolutions. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to object.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the workmen's compensation legislation now pending before the District of Columbia Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause]. The Chair hears none.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, recently I had the pleasure of addressing the House upon the subject of increased salaries for school-teachers in the District of Columbia. At that time I stated that a powerful indictment could be made against the United States Congress, and thus against our Government, for failure to provide for essential legislation of the most extreme importance. Aside from compensation providing for the governmental employees here, there is no workmen's compensation law to protect those engaged in lines of business other than governmental activities.

At the last session of Congress this legislation failed because the contention arose in the Committee on the District of Columbia, and later on the floor of the House, as to the kind of workmen's compensation law which should be enacted for the District. The mere fact that there is no compensation law here because of such contention and because of the neglect of Congress constitutes one of the strongest arguments in favor of greater autonomy in the government of this District by its people.

No person in our country to-day, whether he be an employer or employee, has sufficient hardness of heart to repudiate all workmen's compensation. It is essential legislation of the highest possible type. The men or women who devote themselves to the interests of the Nation and its industrial life have a vested interest in the future welfare of our country. They are building its industries. They are extending our national growth. They are making our country the greatest industrial empire within the history of man. It is reasonable, therefore, to demand of the industries which consume the man power of the Nation that a carrying charge be fixed upon such industry for the protection of those engaged in the course of their employment as well as their dependents.

Let us not quibble at the outset upon the kind of workmen's compensation insurance we will establish here, but since a bill has been reported out of the Committee on the District of Columbia let us insist that the House consider this essential and humanitarian legislation and thus have some protection to the workmen of the District. The Congress, by amendment and substitution, can determine the kind that the Congress wants.

Is this important? The answer to that question is found in stating another inquiry. Is it not important that we conserve the health and strength of future generations by protecting the lives and limbs of those engaged in the work of this generation? This legislation is designed to protect workmen and their dependents engaged principally in physical labor, when death, disease, and injury occurring in the course of employment are visited upon the families of this generation, thereby depriving those families of some of the nurture and sustenance necessary in this age. Now, who can say that this deprivation does not weaken this generation, and hence, those to follow after it? It is almost axiomatic that this legislation should be passed; and no fears should be entertained by anyone that an injustice will be done if any reasonable law is passed by this Congress. The legislation should not suffer merely because men disagree. And in this connection it is interesting to know why essential and humanitarian legislation of this kind should be deferred while Congress considers matters affecting fisheries along the Atlantic seaboard and changes alleged to be necessary in certain Federal judicial districts.

The bill reported out of committee provides for an exclusive governmental insurance feature. It is contended on the one hand that this is detrimental and that the Government should not go into private enterprise, and upon the other hand that the maiming of the human body or its disintegration by disease should not be permitted, in this enlightened age, to become the subject of private gain and profit.

If this legislation shall occupy any of the time of the House in this session, and I earnestly hope it will, I shall call the attention of the House to several features which I believe to be important. Complaints are reaching me from employers who say that they are carrying a necessary but small amount of insurance for the protection of their workmen and that private insurance companies are canceling these policies, stating frankly that the business is not profitable to the companies. That is a reprehensible situation. No company should dare to refuse workmen's compensation insurance to any employer, and all insurance written upon this class of business should receive close scrutiny from the Government. Contentions are also being made that private companies, in order to make profits out of this class of insurance, become very litigious and attempt to drive down the cost of compensation insurance for the employers by defeating claims wherever possible. It is argued that the defeat of these claims take two courses—first, by fine and specious argument in the courts in the interpretation of workmen's compensation statutes; and, second, by tiring the injured employees and their dependents by protracted litigation, which the employees and their dependents are unable to conduct through lack of funds. The latter situation, if continued on the part of private insurance companies, will drive employees eventually and universally into organizations which will have for their object the protection of poor claimants in distress. This means increases in the cost of wages to take care of the additional expense.

I want to vote for a workmen's compensation bill in this session of Congress and sincerely trust that the Committee on the District of Columbia will have the hearty cooperation of all the Members of the House in bringing this to pass.

PARK AND PLAYGROUND SYSTEM IN THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I insist on a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division on the motion to recommit.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 35.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum and object to the vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum. It is clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, do we understand that if we adjourn now the vote will come to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the vote would come to-morrow morning, but it would not be a no-quorum vote.

Mr. BEGG. But this would come up the first thing after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I can not understand what the gentleman's idea is.

Mr. BLANTON. I want a record vote on it.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I move the House do now adjourn. It is 15 minutes to 6.

The question was taken, and the Chair being in doubt, the committee divided, and there were—ayes 30, noes 22.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 27, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.
